AFTER STRANGE GODS.

Grover Cleveland Again Tells What is Necessary.

Ex-President Grover Cleveland contributes to this week's issue of the Saturday Evening Post of Philadelphia an extended article on the "Plight of the Democracy and the Remedy." Mr. Cleveland begins by reviewing the history of the party, and he discusses its defeat since 1864 in detail. In taking up the question of the present condition of the Democracy he says that the success of the party in 1892 was so decisive and overwhelming that a long continuance of its supremacy was anticipated. Then came "the fallacy of free silver" and Populism. Mr. Cleveland proceeds as follows:

"The culmination of Democratic woe was reached when its compact with these undemocratic forces was complete when our rank and file were summoned to do battle under banners which bore strange symbols and were held aloft in unfamiliar hands. The result of such a betrayal was foredoomed. This abandonment of the principals of true Democracy, this contemptuous disobedience of its traditions, and this deliberate violation of the law of its strength and vigor were, by a decree as inexorable as those of fate, followed by the inevitable punishment of stunning, staggering defeat.

"The disaster of 1872 invited by similar mad adventure, was quickly followed by a return to the professions and practice of sane Democracy. But the extent and persistency of our wanderings in 1896 is illustrated in a most astounding way by the command issued on the day of our rout and discomfiture, that a second battle should be fought on the same field, with the same false war cries and the same leadership that had brought us to the surrounding gloom of defeat."

Again he says: "Thus in 1900 the lesson of 1896 was contemptuously rejected, and every hope of Democratic success was wilfully cast aside. Again our long suffering rank and file whose loyalty and obedience deserved better things, were sacrificed in a cause theirs only in name, and again it was demonstrated, but more clearly than ever before, that the only forces that can win Democratic success are adherence to recognized Democratic principles and reliance upon Democratic councils and leadership.

"Why should we not return to these and in their name achieve victory no less glorious and renowned than were our days of courageous advocacy of our time-honored faith? Are our principles to be shopworn or antiquated as to require renovation or their displacement by others more fashionable?

"There is not an honest Democrat in this broad land that will not concede these things, nor is there one who would not hail the proclamation of the old faith with that fighting enthusiasm that foretokens Democratic triumph. As new conditions arise our principles must be applied to them but in the creed that has guided us through a century of party existence we shall find the key to every such application, nor shall we need the lexicon of Populism to aid us in interpreting this creed."

Mr. Cleveland touches in turn on free silver and the Federal courts, and believes that the true Democrats are against condemning "the General Government for protecting itself in the exercise of its functions against violent obstructions within a State." Further on he declares:

"I believe no Democrat will have the hardihood to deny that we have fought our last two campaigns in alliance with undemocratic forces, and that this alliance was immensely costly in defeat. Is there not good reason to suppose that even in success such an alliance would have proved unprofitable and dangerous?"

"We are dealing with the condition of a party that cannot be destroyed by external foes; and since its ruin can be wrought only from within it should be imperishable. Above all things, there should be a manly renunciation and avoidance of undue sectional control. Democracy will not operate efficiently on sectional lines.

"There is much for us to do, and the future is full of Democratic duty and opportunity. Our fighting forces will respond listlessly and falteringly if summoned to a third defeat in a strange cause; but if they hear the rallying call of true Democracy they will gather for battle with old-time Democratic enthusiasm and courage.

"If I should attempt to epitomize what I have written, by suggesting a plan for the rehabilitation and restoration of true Democraty, I should embody these words:

"Give the rank and file a chance,"

Old People Made Young.

J. C. Sherman, the veteran editor of the Vermontville (Mich.) Echo, has discovered the remarkable secret of keeping old people young. For years he has avoided Nervousness, Sleeplessness, Indigestion, Heart trouble, Constipation and Rheumatism, by using Electric Bitters, and he writes: "It can't be praised too highly. It gently stimulates the kidneys, tones the stomach, aids digestion, and gives a splendid appetite. It has worked wonders for my wife and me. It's a marvellous remedy for old people's complaints." He had never imagined such a thing as a typesetting machine or a typewriter.

He had never used anything but a wooden plow.

He had never seen his wife using a sewing machine.

He had never struck a match on his pants or anything else.

He couldn't take an anaesthetic and have his leg cut off without feeling it.

He had never purchased a 10-cent magazine which would have been regarded as a miracle of art.

He could not buy a paper for a cent and learn everything that had happened the day before all over the world.

He had never seen a McCormack reaper or self-binding harvester.

He had never crossed an iron bridge.

In short there were several things that he could not do and several things he did not know.

MURDERER VEST RESCUED.

Gang of Masked Friends Take Fawcett's Slayer Away From Officers.

Thomas Vest, the railway foreman who shot and killed Charles Fawcett, restaurant waiter, at Elkins, W. Va., because he did not wait on him fast enough, was rescued Saturday by a masked band of fifteen friends armed with Winchester rifles while three officers were taking him in a carriage from Beverly to Elkins for a hearing. They stopped the team in a lonely place in the woods and run their gun muzzles in the officers' faces. Vest jumped out and the constable, a small man, fell on him. All the officers were covered with guns. Vest weighs 260 pounds and had no trouble in getting away. He fled through the woods in a westerly direction and will have woods all the way to Kentucky. He and his friends are desperate and the whole country is terrorized. People generally are reported to be arming in anticipation of trouble.

It is said Justice Bradley, before whom the hearing was to have taken place, ordered Vest brought from Beverly by train but the district attorney countermanded the order in spite of the fact that it had been whispered around that Vest's friedds would make an attempt to rescue him. The prosecuting attorney and the sheriff, it is reported, refused to take any action as their terms expired on Monday. Their successors are expected to use every effort to apprehend Vest. The people are anxious to organize a posse but have have no leader.

Fawcett, Vest's victim, died at the Western Maryland Hospital, Cumberland, Monday of last week.

A GREAT RECORD.

The Traffic On the B. & O. Is a Wonderful Feature of Railroad History.

The tremendous traffic of the B. & O. system at present is one of the most wonderful features of railroad history in the United States. They have been compelled recently to borrow engines from the C. & P., the Lehigh Valley system and from the P. & W., and yet within the past three years more than 140 new engines and 40,000 new cars were added to the equipment of the road. The borrowed engines are now being used on the main line and the Pittsburg division, where the freight business is the heaviest ever known and appears to be increasing rapidly. On the Chicago division, between Chicago and Bellaire and between Chicago and Pittsburg via the Akron and Pittsburg and Western divisions the freight business is phenomenally heavy. From Glenwood to Cumberland the road is crowded with trains and most of the Lehigh Valley borrowed engines are being used on this part of the road, while the C. & P. engines are kept on the main line. Each one of the new engines built for the B. & O. system in the past three years is capable of hauling almost twice as many cars as the standard engines that were in use when the the present managers took charge of the affairs of the road and started to rebuild it, each of the new cars will carry almost twice as much freight as the old cars, and yet with all the new engines and cars built for the system and the borrowed engines and cars, they are scarcely able to keep the traffic moving that is offered to them at present.

IN HARBOR.

The ship's in the harbor—the white sails are furled;
Weary the voyage from over the world;
Weary the tossing on billowy foam;
But the captain is glad, and the sailors sing "Home!"
Home at last
From the wave and the blast,
Home at last—at last!

The ship's in the harbor—at anchor she lies
Under the stars of the shadowless skies,
Safe from the seas where the solemn wrecks roam,
And captain and sailors are singing of home.
Home at last
From the wave and the blast,
Home at last—at last!

The ship's in the harbor from ocean's black nights;
The shore bells rang sweetly, and Love's were the lights!
And fairly they twinkled far o'er the white foam—
The lights in the beautiful windows of home.
Home at last
From the wave and the blast,
Home at last—at last!

Oh, ship, safe in harbor for all the long years,
Are you freighted with love—are you freighted with tears?
Do you bring to my soul from the storm and the foam,
The lips that sing love and the heart that makes home?
Home at last
After wave and the blast—
Home at last—at last!

Hard Luck

By W. Bert Foster.

"NOW, that's what I call a downright shame," exclaimed Milton Hartley, to his fellow-clerk, Ned Steele. "Old Bowes has more cheek than I gave him credit for. To think of his asking you to teach that young nephew of his the business, which means your walking ticket sure, as soon as he learns! I wouldn't do it!"

"It is rather hard luck," replied Ned, his voice trembling a little. "He knows just how much I need the money; and even if he were going to discharge me, he needn't have asked me to spend a fortnight or more teaching Charlie Page all I know about the work."

"It's taking the bread right out of your mouth," said the older clerk, indignantly. "Young Page don't need it, either. If I were you, Ned, I'd skip, and let the old man teach his nephew himself. No one can do your work as you do it, anyway."

"I shall be on the lookout for another job. Work's pretty scarce, you know, and it's hard enough living on six dollars a week now."

"You're right, Ned. I don't see how you do it. Why, I can't live half decent on $50 a month, and I've no one to look after but myself."

"Yet mother and Nan and I have got along very well so far, and probably there'll be a way opened," said Ned, cheerfully, as he turned to his desk.

"Well, you're a wonder to me," muttered Milton.

Young Hartley could not, and probably never would, understand the meaning of economy. He spent all he had and found that far from enough, although his income was twice that of Ned Steele.

Hartley was head clerk when Ned entered the employ of Bowes & Co., nearly a year before, and Ned had taken what the boys call "a shine" to the flashily-dressed and careless young man of the world. Not that Ned was led into the the certainly questionable company in which Milton Hartley shone; but he admired from a distance.

Their lives were entirely different, and always would be, Ned told himself. He had a mother and little sister to help support, and such pleasures as his fellow-clerk indulged in were not for him.

"Hard luck! that's what it is," he thought, as he leaned over his books.

Only that noon Mr. Bowes had called his youngest clerk into the private office, and shooting a piercing glance over his gold-bowed spectacles at Ned, as was his habit when talking, said, sternly:

"Mr. Steele, my nephew, Charles Page, will be here next Monday morning, and I wish you to teach him your work thoroughly. I intend to make some changes here shortly. That is all."

That was all; but it meant everything to Ned—more than he had even let Milton know; and now, as he bent low over the page of his ledger, two great tears splashed down on the neat rows of figures, and he dashed his hand across his eyes, and bit his lip in vexation at this little weakness.

"Hard luck!" he muttered, as he went home to supper; and it was a very grave Ned Steele that entered the little house that evening.

When little Nan had been put to bed, Ned told his mother the bad news, and received the comfort that a kind, Christian mother always has for her boy.

"Keep up your courage, my son," she said, as Ned kissed her good night. "Maybe good will come out of your 'hard luck.'"

"I wish I could think so," replied Ned.

True to promise, Mr. Bowes introduced Charlie Page into the office the following Monday morning, and it was well he did, for Milton did not make his appearance all day, and even a "green hand" was some help.

Mr. Bowes went about with a face like a thunder-cloud, and it was none the less dark when Milton came in the next day, as cool and placid as ever. Mr. Bowes' sharpest reprimand never ruffled the serenity of his head clerk.

Charlie Page and Ned had been school friends before Ned's father died; but Charlie's warmth of friendship was considerably chilled by his old schoolmate's very apparent coldness.

"I wonder what it can be that's changed Ned so," mused Charlie, entirely innocent of any such thought as displacing his former school-chum.

But as Ned's stiffness rather increased than diminished, Charlie gave him up entirely, determined that "he would show Ned Steele that his friendship couldn't be refused twice."

So, under the existing circumstances, they had anything but a jolly time of it in Bowes & Co.'s office, with Ned growing more stiff and solemn every day. Milt's absence becoming more and more frequent, and the proprietor's face like a storm-cloud from one week's end to another.

Giving up Ned in disgust, Charlie turned his attention to Milton Hartley, and soon an acquaintance sprang up between them that boded no good for Mr. Bowes' nephew. Unlike Ned, he not only admired Milton, but he longed to imitate him, at least in some things. In fact, Charlie wanted to be "a man of the world." He eagerly accepted Milton's invitation, one day given, to—

"Come downtown to-night, Page, and I'll teach you billiards, if you'd like to learn."

Ned looked up quickly from his work, and almost spoke the warning that was at his tongue's end. But the thought: "It's none of my business," kept him silent. Conscience, however, gave him no peace; so as they were closing up for the night, he said:

"Charlie, don't you go with Milt to-night. Your uncle won't like it."

"Is that any of your business?" snapped Charlie, who knew very well that his uncle would be far from pleased at such an escapade. "Don't give your advice, Steele, till it's called for."

Ned turned on his heel and left, angry with himself for speaking, yet knowing that Charlie was just entering a path that would be certain ruin to such an impulsive, head-strong fellow.

"It's nothing to me—none of my business," said Ned, savagely, thinking of the hard luck Charlie's presence in the office would bring him.

"Are you too tired to take the work I've finished over to Mrs. Coles for me after tea, Ned?" was Mrs. Steele's gentle inquiry, during the meal.

"Not at all, mother," was Ned's cheerful reply; and so he set out, immediately after his appetite was satisfied, for the long tramp across the city.

Though cheerful before his mother, Ned's thoughts were far from pleasant as he walked on through the almost deserted streets. Now and then fine carriages dashed past him, and he longed to be like the occupants—wealthy.

If he only had money enough to live in a big house as Mr. Bowes did, or like Charlie's folks, he'd ride in a carriage, too, and—but this unprofitable reverie was cut short by his arrival at Mrs. Coles'. He delivered the work and turned again toward home.

Two figures passed before him out of a brilliantly lighted billiard room and separated on the corner.

"Good night, Charlie. Guess you can get home all right," Ned heard Milton Hartley's voice say. "The air will do your head good. It was confounded hot in there, that's a fact."

"Won't you come a little way with a fellow?" said the other, leaning unsteadily against the lamp-post. "That stuff I had made me terribly dizzy."

"Oh, that'll be all right in a few minutes. I must be off. Good night."

"Scoundrel!" exclaimed Ned, as Hartley turned the corner. Then he stepped forward and grasped Charlie's arm. "Come on home, Page. I'll help you."

"Is that you, Steele?" said Charlie, thickly. "Let go of my arm. I can get along without your help. Let go, say."

He wrenched away from Ned and staggered half across the street, but slipped, and fell all in a heap, too confused for a moment to move. A carriage turned the corner, and had Ned not pulled him back in the nick of time, in all probability the foolish fellow would have been killed.

It was all done in a flash—the fall, the rush of hoofs, Ned's plucky action—then Ned Steele found himself lying on the edge of the sidewalk, feeling a little faint and with a badly-wrenched ankle. Mr. Bowes was bending over him, and Charlie Page sat on the curbstone beside him, now thoroughly sobered.

"Help me into the carriage with him, Charlie," said Mr. Bowes, huskily. "Had it not been for him I probably should have run over and killed my own nephew."

In his uncle's library, with Ned stretched on the sofa beside him, Charlie made a clean breast of the affair, and was freely forgiven. And Ned, after some urging, explained his own conduct toward his former schoolfellow.

"Why, did you think that I had any intention of discharging you, Edward?" said Mr. Bowes. "My intention was to discharge Milton Hartley, and give you his position as soon as Charlie was capable of doing your work. You are fully competent, my boy, so Hartley goes to-morrow, and Edward Steele will be head clerk for Bowes & Co."

This was good news indeed, and when Ned kissed his mother, before he left home to take his seat for the first time at Milt's old desk, he said, laughingly:

"It was all a mistake about my hard luck, mother. I'll never cry out again before I am hit."

GOVERNMENT TREE PLANTING

Efforts of the Forestry Division to Encourage the Work in Treeless Regions.

The crusade for forest preservation and the propagation of scientific tree planting appear to be going hand in hand, and in both there has been aroused in all sections of the country an immense amount of interest. In New York city a powerful and wealthy organization known as the Tree Planting association has been formed to rehabilitate the great asphalt wastes of the metropolis; a prominent university has established a college of forestry; in more than a score of states countless village improvement associations are devoting especial attention to the fostering of the shade tree; and finally the United States government has taken up the subject of practical tree planting in a manner that promises some surprising results, says the Saturday Evening Post.

It was just a year ago that the division of forestry of the department of agriculture issued circulars describing a plan of cooperation by which practical assistance was offered to persons desirous of establishing wood lots, shelter belts, wind belts and other plantations of forest trees. The response to the proposition exceeded all expectations, and the division has been more than busy ever since, examining the land owned by persons who requested its cooperation.

The greater part of last year was devoted to what might be termed experimental or preliminary work, and a large number of applicants were visited in Minnesota, North Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma and Texas. As a result of the examinations made by the experts during this interval 33 working plans have been prepared and are being put into execution in various parts of the country. Each of these working plans is based upon the special needs of a particular class of farm. So great is the magnitude of this work that notices are now being sent out admonishing persons who desire the assistance of the division to make their applications some months in advance of the time when they desire to plant, in order that opportunity may be afforded for an agent to visit the land and complete the plans under which the work is to be carried out.

As soon as the officials of the division of forestry ascertain when an expert tree planter will be able to reach the land owned by an applicant, the latter is notified, and in places where suitable arrangements can be made a public meeting is called in order that all the persons in the neighborhood interested in tree planting may attend and confer with the agent. Afterward the agent goes over the ground of each of the proposed plantations, and obtains all available data. This personal examination is deemed necessary in all cases, because of the effect of local conditions on tree growth.

Later, the agent works up the data obtained and sends to the farmer complete planting plans. These include a carefully prepared map of the farm, with the proposed plantations planted, and there are embodied instructions which state specifically the way to plant and the number of each species required to complete the plantation. The department of agriculture does all this absolutely without cost to the farmer.

Applications for assistance in establishing plantations of forest trees have been received from every state in the union, but more than nine-tenths of them have come from the treeless regions of Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska and the Dakotas; regions where trees are most strongly needed for protection to stock, orchards and buildings, and for fuel. Naturally the experts have found it far more difficult to attain success in this wholesale tree planting in the open prairie than in regions originally wooded. The government tree planters have, however, gone on the theory that there is not a single inhabited region in the United States where some kind of trees may not be made to grow when given adequate assitance in the way of cultivation and irrigation, and they are making it the chief object of the cooperative system of tree planting to assist the farmers in overcoming adverse conditions.

The attention given to scientific tree planting seems to indicate that there assuredly will be a sphere of usefulness for future graduates of the New York State College of Forestry, a branch of Cornell university, which graduated its first class this year. The Cornell students, during the past year, with the assitance of a planting crew of 20 men, partially cleared 100 acres of burned land and planted it in pine, spruce and red fir. The United States division of forestry has already secured the services of several foth ese young men, who are the first professional foresters to receive degrees from an American institution.

NAMED VICAR GENERAL.

Father M. J. Fitzsimmons Appointed to the Second Office in the Archdiocese of Chicago.

Archbishop Feehan, of Chicago, has appointed Father M. J. Fitzsimmons to be vicar general of the archdiocese of Chicago to succeed the late Very Rev. D. M. J. Dowling, whose demise occurred last July. The office is one high in the church, and the incumbent exerices all functions of the archbishop during the latter's absence, besides acting always in the capacity of chief counselor and adviser. The new vicar general is the present pastor of the Holy Name parish, the resident parish of the Chicago cathedral. The now Very Rev. Fitzsimmons has been concerned in the local work of his calling for many years, although he is comparatively a young man.

The new adviser to Archbishop Feehan formerly held the responsible and arduous position of chancellor and secretary of the archdiocese. He succeeded the late Father Dowling in that office. His promotion in ecclesiastical position came with his selection as rector of the parish over which he now presides.

Father Fitzsimmons was born in Morris, Ill., where he attended the country schools. Upon his determination to study for the priesthood he entered the church college at Kankakee, Ill. Graduating with honorable mention from that institution, he secured admission to the seminary at Baltimore, and 18 years ago was ordained.

The first assignment given to the then young clergyman was that of assistant pastor of St. Mary's church, Chicago. There he remained until Archbishop Feehan called him to the cathedral as one of his assistants. In that capacity he won both the affection and confidence of the archbishop, and his promotions were rapid until he succeeded to the chancellorship.

HUNTING ADVENTURE.

How a New York State Nimrod Learned Difference Between Coons and Porcupines.

Curtis Burgett, of Rochester, N. Y., now knows that the fretful porcupine is always loaded; further, that the animal is unexpectedly easy on the trigger.

Burgett, to say nothing of his dog, were out coon hunting. To hunt coons one goes on a darkest kind of night and falls over logs, steps into creeks, is scratched and bruised and maimed, and goes home at daylight for the arnica, imagining that at least he gave the dog a good time.

Well, on that particular night the dog sat on his tail at the root of a giant oak and bayed and bayed, till Curtis fell and crushed and crawled to the midnight scene. Then, as the dog couldn't climb, Curtis Burgett crawled upward toward the dark spot that ought to have been a coon.

But it was a porcupine.

The two mixed in mid air and came down together, where the dog sailed in and bit Burgett twice before he got his mouth full of quills.

Somebody found Burgett and the dog and the quills next morning, but the porcupine was gone. With good nursing Burgett will get well. The dog, however, will look for game hereafter with only one eye.

The just completed census of the Ottoman government shows the total number of Mussulmans to be 196,500,000, of whom 18,000,000 belong to Turkey in Europe, 99,000,000 in Asia Minor, Beluchistan and the Indies, 20,000,000 to China, 36,500,000 to the north and northeast of Africa, and 23,000,000 spread in groups more or less numerous throughout the other countries of the world.

BUILDING UP TRADE.

Americans Do Not Seem to Understand the Art.

Francis B. Loomis, Our Minister to Venezuela, Tells Why Our Merchants Do Not Hold Their Own in South America.

To make sure of success in dealing with the Latin American, every business man should learn the Spanish language. Every young man who desires to succeed in business should master Spanish. Trade follows a spoken and written language more certainly and steadily than it follows a flag, says Francis B. Loomis, in Success.

The United States does not have in any part of Latin America the share of trade its productivity and proximity entitle it to. The Germans, the English, the French, and even the Spaniards, exhibit a higher degree of commercial intelligence in dealing with South Americans than do the people of the United States. Our merchants and manufacturers are loath to understand that in order to succeed in Central or South America they must conform to business methods to which centuries of usage have given the force and prestige of national custom. If we desire to do business with South Americans we must, in a large measure, do business in their way, and not try to force our methods on them, even though we may be convinced that our manner of conducting commercial affairs is superior to those used by them.

The South American merchant is accustomed to long credit. Six months is the usual period, but in some cases it is extended a full year. He will pay, but he must have time in which to do so, for it is the custom of the trader to act as banker as well as merchant. He makes large advances in money and supplies to the owners of coffee and other plantations, to enable them to pay their laborers, and the merchant-banker does not expect repayment until the coffee crop has been harvested and sold. As that is but once a year, it will be seen that long time in making payments is necessary for the continued success of his business.

In the matter of selling goods the Americans are far behind their European rivals in South America. As a rule, an American salesman will come to Caracas, the capital of Venezuela, and stay between steamers—one week. The chances are that he will be unable to speak Spanish, and be equally ignorant of the business methods that obtain in the country. As a result, he usually has the time, labor and expense of his trip for nothing. The European salesman, who always speaks the language of the country, comes to Caracas and remains two months or more. He becomes acquainted with the people, and makes many personal friends. He appreciates, what the average American does not, that sentiment counts for a good deal in the business transactions of the Latin race, and takes advantage of this knowledge. He knows that it pays to have customers bound to him by ties of friendship. He secures a large order and remains away for a whole year, safe in the knowledge that his customer is not likely to buy elsewhere in his absence.

FRANCIS B. LOOMIS.

Venezuela has a population of about 3,000,000, but schould have five times as many inhabitants. It is a large country, with much fertile land, besides enormous mineral, timber and other natural resources. It is capable of becoming an important cotton and rice producing country. In fact, during our civil war its shipments of those products to Europe were considerable. At present its chief products are coffee, chocolate and hides. We are the largest buyers from Venezuela, but do not sell as much in return as we should. These conditions will change just as soon as American merchants appreciate the fact that, to do business with Latin Americans, it must be done according to Latin American customs.

Overwhelmed the Orators.

Prof. Tait, of Edinburgh, after having subdued a lady pianist who annoyed him by taking to the bagpipes, was troubled by an amateur elocutionist in the house. One day, the story goes, when the house was filled with oratory, a volley of explosions came from Tait's room, followed by smoke and unearthly smells. The lessons in oratory were suspended, and everyone in the house collected to find out what the trouble was. Tait, with unmoved conscience, said to the landlord: "As there seems to be no restrain on the nature of the studies pursued in these lodgings, I have begun a series of experiments in high explosives, from which I expect to draw much advantage." The elocution ceased.

This is a description of thousands of cases which come to Mrs. Pinkham's attention daily. WOMAN AND HOME

THE FLOUR SHAMPOO.

A Common-Sense Substitute for the Horrible Messiness of Soap Suds and Water.

Isn't it a pity that women persist in ruining their hair by too much soap and water? says the London Mail. One of the most successful coiffures refuses to shampoo with it oftener than twice a year unless the hair is unusually oily. For other shampoos, given once a month, flour is used. The flour bath takes time, but is an effective shampoo. The powder is sifted into the hair in handfuls. Then the locks are divided into sections and brushed with a soft brush until every particle of white dust has been removed. Three or four applications of flour should be used at each shampoo, the color and consistency of the refuse proving that an amazing amount of dust is removed from the hair and scalp with each application.

Twice a year the hair should be singed at the season when trees and hedges are cut back. After the soap and water shampoo only the purest castile soap should be used on the hair—brilliantine should be applied, and then there will be no trace of the stiffness and dryness usually so noticeable after this shampoo. The hair should be brushed every night with fine, flexible brushes, and the brushes should be cleaned twice or three times a week with flour or ammonia and water.

If the hair is turning gray or falling out massage is the best remedy, and by massage is not meant a rubbing of the scalp, which will ruin the finest head of hair, but a rotary movement of the scalp. To massage properly a finger is firmly pressed against the head, and the loose scalp under it pushed with a rotary motion. The fingers are moved from point to point, but are never permitted to slide over or rub the scalp.

These new methods are abundantly successful, but some women, in spite of expert advice, persist in clinging to old and dangerous ways, and then they wonder why the hair becomes thin or unlovely. Much harm is often done by the use of noxious kinds of soap—a misguided passion for cleanliness should not mean the destruction of beauty, but its preservation or enhancement.

BABY'S FINGER NAILS.

Mothers Should Take Care of Them If They Would Preserve the Beauty of Darling's Hands.

If the mother would preserve the beautiful contour and texture of her baby's soft little hands she cannot begin too early to care for them. As it is, however, few girls ever own a manicure set until they are young women. By that time, as often as not, the hand is beyond reclaim. Baby's finger nails should be trimmed neatly and carefully from very birth. During the first year this will be sufficient, but from that time on the mother will give them a five minutes' treatment at least once a week.

Any little detached cuticle about the base of the nails must be trimmed off from day to day with the tiniest and brightest manicure scissors obtainable, and the flesh about the nail pressed away from it with a soft, old piece of linen. In this way the tender, delicate flesh about the finger tips will become firm and hard, and the child will not suffer from that painful affliction known as hang nails. This, while commonly regarded as a most trivial thing, is, nevertheless, often the cause of much graver troubles, ending in nervous diseases and blood poisoning.

Where a baby's nails have been properly trimmed from birth the habit of nail biting is never contracted. Where it has already been formed, however, the mother can overcome it immediately by putting the child through a careful course of treatment. If the nails are tough enough to stand the operation they will be filed instead of cut with scissors, and at first they will be kept very short.

Something will be done every day, even if it is only to rub them gently. As biting the nails is a purely nervous affection, it is imperative, in aggravated cases, to put the child under a physician's care. If baby should suddenly display a voracious appetite for its finger nails, as is often the case even in infants, you can depend upon it that something is not right, and the physician will probably tell you that the food is not agreeing with it.

Children should be taught from babyhood how to hold the hands gracefully and naturally while in repose, and when using them to do so daintily.

Each time after the hands are washed a good plan is for the mother or nurse to not only press back the flesh about the base of the nail as already described, but to also press the tips of the fingers very firmly on either side of the nail, and the result in a few years will be the beautiful tapering finger tips so rare and so much coveted by everybody, especially every woman.—N. Y. Herald.

SUPPORTS HIS MOTHER.

Tiny Boy Baby Poses Before the Camera and Is Paid Ten Dollars an Hour for the Work.

Just a tiny baby and yet the main support of his mother! Jersey City is the home of this unusual youngster, and the neighbors of tiny Max Fairchild watch him every day with a great deal of interest.

Little Max is as beautiful and as bright as it is possible for a child to be, and because nature has endowed him with such rare charms he is able to earn ten dollars an hour as a model for a New York photographer, whose special line of work is furnishing artistic baby pictures for advertisements. Baby Max's pictures are scattered all over the world by this time. Look at the boxes of powder in the druggists' show case and you are almost certain to see the dear little form and face of Baby Max.

When the tiny model was but a few months old his mother received a great shock. The father of little Max was a traveling salesman and was killed in a train wreck. The young mother and her infant son were left with but meager means of support. One day Mrs. Fairchild learned that a New York photographer wanted a pretty baby for a model and so she took her little son to his studio. The man with the camera was immediately pleased and said that the youngster was just the one he had been looking for. The baby was undressed as for his bath and sat on a table merrily cooing and expecting his splash in the water. The bright little face and perfect form was all that any artist could wish. After an hour's posing there was a set of the prettiest baby pictures that ever came from a studio. The advertisers who had given orders to the photographer were decidedly pleased, and this is how dimpled Max Fairchild became a model, earning enough to support himself and his widowed young mother.

WINDOW GARDENING.

Haphazard Care Does Not Pay with House Plants; They Need Constant Attention.

Nine-tenths of the windows used for window gardening are too crowded for the plants to look well or do well. Turn a new leaf right now by throwing away every poor or insignificant growth. Better to buy new stock in the spring than to turn your precious window space into a hospital ward for sickly plants.

Keep the foliage immaculately clean. Wash the leaves once or twice every week. A plant's lungs are its leaves. Showering the foliage washes the dust out of the pores, refreshes the plant and imparts vigor. Besides this, clean plants do not harbor insects, the greatest foe of the indoor garden, and the hardest to fight.

Loosen the crusted earth at the top of the pots. The roots need air, and in soft, pliable earth they get it by capillary transmission. A hard top crust seals the soil up as though in a jug. Neither air nor water finds free entrance through it. Plants in hard soil often suffer from lack of moisture at the roots, though water has been given every day.

Slide the shades up to the top of the upper sash; take down the curtains at the plant windows, and let God's invigorating sun shine in. Sunshine to a plant is what gold is to a Klondike miner.

In extremely cold weather stay the watering pot. Plants need little water during severe weather, and they chill or freeze twice as quickly after a fresh drenching. If watering becomes absolutely necessary have it the temperature of the room, and give only in the morning. Watering in the evening during a cold snap is to invite a visit from Jack Frost.

Pet your plants. Turn them, train them into shape as they grow, pick off every dead leaf or faded flower. Haphazard care does not pay with house plants.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Composite Bird on a Hat.

Frank M. Chapman, assistant curator of the Museum of National History, is an observing ornithologist and is continually making interesting discoveries in the befeathered monstrosities with which some women adorn their hats. Of the many which have claimed his attention in none perhaps is the plumage of different birds so confusingly intermingled as in a hat he observed recently in a cable car of New York city. He discovered there a whippoorwill's wings, a black cock's tail, a grebe's breast, a bunch of aigrettes, paradise bird's plumes and a humming bird.

THE FARMING WORLD

FATTENING TURKEYS.

A Feeding Arrangement Which Helps Them to Get Their Share of the Daily Rations.

It is often desirable to hasten the fattening of young turkeys. Where there are chickens, young and old, the feed scattered to the fowls mostly goes to the chickens, as they are faster eaters than turkeys. Turkeys are not as good "rustlers" as chickens. But to get them ready for market, they must be well fed. To give turkeys their just share, and even more, of the feed, I use an arrangement as illustrated. The feed stand is made of an orange box and a few laths. Taking a box head, I nailed two-inch strips around it, making a shallow box. The legs are laths; on the box I put another lid; and above all I made a peaked roof. Then I nailed strips around the box which left openings large enough for the turkeys to put their heads through. The grain is put in the box and turkeys can eat whenever they wish. If desired, instead of the peak, a few bricks can be placed on the box. It is marvelous how the cockerels can cling to the edge and stick their heads through the openings. The length of the legs must be determined by the size of the turkeys.—Cornelius Brauckman, in Farm and Home.

PURE WATER FOR SHEEP.

Unless They Get a Regular and Ample Supply Disease Is Apt to Decimate the Flock.

An important point in successful sheep management is the water supply. While good water is a great thing in growing all kinds of live stock, it is especially so with the sheep, which is not only a dainty feeder, but a dainty drinker, and will only take bad, stagnant water into its stomach when driven to it by thirst. Not only will it suffer for the want of drink when the supply is bad, but it is subject to more diseases, usually parasitic, that have their origin in polluted water, than any other of the domestic animals. Where the flocks get their supply from surface water courses liable to pollution of all kinds, sick sheep may be expected with the aggravation that it is often impossible to determine what is the matter with the animals or what to do for them. With such a source of supply, also, a rainy season which washes the soil from long distances and brings down accumulations of filth, is likely to increase the amount of obscure disease in the flock. It is also no unusual cause of scours in the lambs. We generally look for the cause of scours in the food, but quite as often it is due to impure water. Everybody is familiar with the disturbance in the human family, particularly in hot weather, which follows the use of bad water. The stomach of the lamb, and even the sheep, is quite as susceptible to dangers from this source as is that of the shepherd. We often see flocks on fairly good pastures, that ought to do well so far as feed is concerned, showing a lack of thrift and a general dullness for which there seems to be, at first blush, no apparent reason. Very often an examination of the water supply will reveal the cause.—Wool, Markets and Sheep.

Cut Green Bone for Hens.

We have seen it stated that there are some people who are of the opinion that cut green bone is of no advantage to laying hens, and even lean to the belief that the feeding of it is frequently attended with injury. You can find people who will contend that about every article of food which has ever been recommended by experienced poultrymen is unfit for that purpose, and it is likely to make serious trouble if so used. There are people in the world who find pleasure in being contrary, and some of them have gone into the poultry business. It is to be regretted if they have convinced any beginner that cut green bone cannot be fed to laying hens in reasonable quantity with entire safety.—Farmers' Voice.

Feeding Lambs for Market.

In feeding lambs for market, the feeder must have in view the fact that there is most demand for the lamb that has fat and is plump at the weight of 100 pounds. This type is one that is not too much boned and big framed, but such as require only a small amount of flesh to make the carcass smooth and plump at the weight indicated. When it comes to feeding yearlings, then a larger framed sheep, one with smooth and deep flesh at 125 to 150 pounds, is the one that is desirable. The feeder must have these facts in mind when he considers the ideal type for the feed lot, in addition to a consideration of that which gives the greatest gain.

DRESSED BIRDS ARE DEAD.

The Needed Lesson That Was Given a Fault Finding Poultry Dealer.

During last Thanksgiving week a poultryman of the northwest sent several barrelfuls of fat, dressed turkeys to a certain commission merchant, who is an extremely "close buyer" and never fails when he receives a consignment to claim an allowance for something alleged to have spoiled on the way. Heretofore, says the San Francisco Argonaut, he had dealt exclusively in live fowls, and probably the correspondence clerk got things mixed. At any rate the shipper was astonished to receive a letter by return mail about as follows:

"Dear Sir: We regret to advise you that four of the turkeys in your consignment of November reached here dead. Please make deduction for same and return correct amount. Yours truly."

The poultryman communed with himself and replied thus:

"Dear Sir: I am sorry to say I find it impossible to make the concession requested. I have established a rule requiring all customers who desire live dressed turkeys to notify us in advance, so we can send them in heated cars. Turkeys without feathers and insides are liable to catch cold if shipped in the ordinary manner. The mortality among dressed turkeys was very large this year. Yours mournfully."

Sandy as an Art Critic.

One day, while Millais was painting his famous picture, "Chill October," among the reeds and rushes on the banks of the Tay, a man came up behind him and stood looking at the picture, then at the surrounding landscape. Finally he asked in a broad Scotch dialect: "Man, did ye never try photography?" "No, never," replied Millais, painting slowly. A pause. "It's a hantle (great deal) quicker," said the man. "Yes, I suppose so." Another pause; then the Scotchman added, thoughtfully: "An' it's mair like the place!"—San Francisco Argonaut.

Complimented His Wife.

Some automobilists along a lonely country road stopped at a wayside cabin to get a drink. The man of the house answered their knock. When he withdrew for pitcher and glass there came a voice from within as of some one objecting—a high, feminine voice not likely to languish for want of practice. Through the open door the automobilists could see that an exquisite cleanliness prevailed. The orderliness without had already struck them. As they quaffed the water—"Your wife must be a fine housekeeper," remarked one of the party. "Ya-as," said the man, thoughtfully, his eyes fixed on the horizon, "she's h—l on dirt."—Chicago Chronicle.

PAIN OPENED HER SKULL

Mrs. Lasher's Remarkable Story—Dr. Greene's Nervura Cured Her.

MRS. FRED. C. LASHER, JR.

The case of Mrs. Fred. C. Lasher, Jr., a well-known woman of Westport, N. Y., is one of the most interesting on record. It is an actual fact that headaches caused her head to split.

"For thirteen years," she says, "I suffered from terrible headaches night and day, until the bones of my skull opened so that the doctor could lay his thumb right into the opening on to my brain. Two doctors attended me and claimed that I was on the verge of insanity. I was under their care for nine years, but got no relief. Then I tried Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy, and inside of a year the bones of my head had taken their natural shape again."

That Mrs. Lasher's statements are true is vouched for by reliable men of Westport, and by a Justice of the Peace there. Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy cured Mrs. Lasher when all other remedies failed, and it cures thousands of suffering women every year. If your head aches, if you cannot sleep and are weak and nervous, remember that this great curative agent, Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy, will make you well and strong.

Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy is a physician's prescription, formulated from a discovery after years of investigation and experiment. Dr. Greene, 35 West 14th St., New York City, is the discoverer. He can be consulted free personally or by letter.

"God and the People."

Bishop Henry C. Potter says of the new century:

"A new century should be like a new volume in the great Encyclopedia of human history; and a true man may wisely resolve to write upon its first page, as the law to govern all the rest, Mazzini's motto: 'God and the people, now and forever!' the One, the Fountain of all best motive in service; the other, the one Fellowship large enough for all service and all heroisms."

To make matters plain to the editor of the Journal we will give him an opportunity to define some of the words used in that paper reflecting upon the character of the editor of THE REPUBLICAN in open court when it meets in Oakland at no distant day, as intimated in our issue of a few weeks ago. Harsher methods may be necessary, Mr. Hamill, before that time arrives, but we shall make an effort to forbear.

In your issue of December 20th you again applied the term "vulgar and idiotic" to us. If you can afford to use such language in your paper, Mr. Hamill, we are sure we are able to stand it, as no doubt the people of the county are perfectly aware that such epithets can injure only those who apply them. We are quite sure, Mr. Hamill, that by this time the public has formed its unbiased opinion of both of us. We are not aware of an act committed by us of which we are ashamed unless it is of having at one time lent a helping hand to you when you were unable to help yourself, but we are not quite sure of being ashamed of that, as the laws of humanity teach us to help those who cannot help themselves. We leave it to the sober judgment of our readers as well as yours, Mr. Hamill, that we have treated you as considerately as we well could during this last "break"—or since you so unfairly made an attack upon the teachers' institute. It has been said by a prominent Baltimore educator that unjust criticism upon any educational meeting usually comes from an enemy of education. We would be sorry indeed, Mr. Hamill, to class you as an enemy of education, looking back as we do over the great (?) efforts put forth by you both as an official and as an editor to advance the educational interests of the children of Garrett county, not taking into consideration the fact that you were a member of the School Board the year the Oakland school building was erected and the children of the county given an opportunity to attend a session of twenty-nine days the entire scholastic year. Not two months, Mr. Hamill, as you state in your paper of December 20th, but just twenty-nine days. If you were not equally responsible for the erection of the Oakland school building with the other members of the School Board, Mr. Hamill, you were certainly lax in your obligations as a public official. You are terribly afraid, Mr. Hamill, to have your actions as an official of the county brought before the people. It seems to put you on pins and needles to mention any act on your part as a member of the School Board. May we enquire why this is thus? Are you still afraid of public opinion? So far as we are concerned we were heartily in favor of the erection of the Oakland school building, but after the bonding measure was defeated, Mr. Hamill, you cannot truthfully assert that you or any other member of the School Board was importuned by us to erect the building for we knew it would result in the children of the county losing a year's schooling.

Now, Mr. Hamill, we have dealt with you as lieniently as we well could under the circumstances. You endeavor to draw other members of our family into this controversy and more than hint at a dishonest act committed by some one with whom we are connected. We give you leave, Mr. Hamill, to tell all you know—in fact we demand that you make your meaning plain. But we warn you, Mr. Hamill, that should you make any statement which cannot be borne out by the truth it will be a sorry day for you, sir. We may cease to forbear in that event.

Problems of the Twentieth Century.

When it is an impossibility to absolutely designate any of the many great problems solved during the nineteenth century as the greatest, it is promptly realized what an impossibility it would be to envelope any one of the problems which must be answered during the twentieth century with a superlativeness. Men's views and purposes are conflicting; that which impresses one as a matter of supreme importance in the mind of a neighbor is but secondary. One will look at the scientific advancement as of supreme importance, another will give the same position to the mechanical development, another will find his ultima thule in some phase of governmental development, and so on.

But despite these circumstances there have existed in the past centuries certain guide posts which seem to indicate the paths of the future. An analysis of the great events of past centuries generally reveals a close connection with industrialism. Even the greatest of moral reforms have not been seperated entirely from industrialism. In fact, it would seem that the great reform movements have been more truly an outgrowth of industrialism than being of spontaneous birth. When the great moral wave has swelled in unison with the surge of industrialism they have united and swept all before them. When they have met in opposition, the cause of reform has proven the weaker and been overswept by the other.

We are prone to speak of the widespread growth of representative goverment, one of the great achievements of the past century, as a victory of morality, a recognition of the rights of man. Go deeper to the cry: "No taxation without representation," and you find that the cause was industrialism, not reform. We look to the overthrow of slavery by the civil war as a great moral advance. Go back and you find that the civil war was precipitated by industrialism. The increasing conflict between the free labor of the North and the slave labor of the South had more effect in precipitating the civil war than the moral opposition to slavery. Industrialism, as in the revolution, here united with a great moral crusade and swept on to victory.

In view of these facts and guide posts speculative inquirers into the problems of the dawning century must be industrial, rather than moral. We find the great problem to be that of over-production. It has always been a difficult problem in every century, but the development of human energy in the past hundred years has been such as to increase it to an overwhelming importance. Tables prepared under the supervision of Mr. Wright show that in forty leading manufacturing industries taken together "the productive power of the labor unit was fifty per cent. greater in the ninth decade than in the eighth decade;" and it is probable that when the census just taken is analyzed as remarkable an increase will be shown during it. The surplus products of the various manufacturing nations must be disposed of or the mills must close. It is this grinding of industrialism that frequently forces us into violent conflict with our own moral impulses; into policies which are inexcusable on other grounds than those of necessity—an adherence to the all pervading law of self-survival.

The topic is a great one, with manifold radiations that will soon bewilder and perplex the investigator; indeed, from the start it will be found necessary to limit the area, if the single inquirer is to accomplish anything. In the light of the knowledge thus gathered many things that the future holds that may seem puzzling as thay arise will be rendered clear; just as those of the past appear now when subjected to its rays.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 31, 1900.

President McKinley has been assured by Senator Hawley, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, that there would be no dalay in putting the substitute for the House Army Reorganization bill, prepared by his committee, through the Senate as soon as Congress reasembles. Senator Hawley also expressed the opinion that an agreement would be speedily reached with the House when the bill was sent to Conference. The latter opinion is fully shared by Chairman Hull of the House Military Committee, who made a careful personal canvass of the Senate before the recess. Secretary Root is naturally prejudiced in favor of some sections of the House bill, which was prepared by him or under his direction, but he says he will not stand in the way of legislation that is so urgently needed by opposing the substitute, or in any way raising obstacles to delay the passage of the bill just because it does not meet his personal views in all its details. He wants authority to enlist the men needed, and wants it quickly as possible, regardless of the details of the law providing therefor.

Mr. Charles S. Francis, Editor of the Troy, N. Y., Times, who is in Washington for the purpose of getting his commission and instructions as United States Minister to Greece, Roumania and Servia, is one of the few men who accept official position for sentimental reasons. In his own words, "I have little ambition to hold public office further than the sentiment that attaches to occupying the same position in the public service that my father had before me. I was with him in Europe during his diplomatic service as his Secretary."

A movement is on foot and being vigorously pushed to have the Senate inaugurate the 20th Century legislation by ratifying the treaty already favorably reported, which binds the United States to a prohibition of the sale of intoxicants in Africa, between twenty degrees north latitude and twenty-two degrees south latitude, and to add a resolution inviting the nations of the world to join in protecting barbarian native races everywhere, on the first legislative day of the new century, Thursday, January 3rd. The movement also includes the passage by the House, on the same day, of the Gillett bill prohibiting the sale of intoxicants or fire-arms by Americans to the natives of the New Hebrides islands, a traffic which England has already prohibited. The idea of this movement is to emphasize the attitude of the United States on progressive christianity and moral reform.

Among President McKinley's callers Saturday was Major John R. Lynch, the only colored paymaster in the army, who is home on a furlough from Santiago, Cuba, where he is stationed. Of the present situation in Cuba, he said: "The people are divided into three classes. The foreigners, which include the Spaniards, are the only people with any considerable amount of good will toward us. They like us better than any of the others. The next class is composed of Cubans who have amassed property. This class and the first-mentioned want annexation to the United States, or protection from us. The third class, made up of the mass of the people, wants independence, and wants it quick. They haven't a particle of good feeling for us and apparently do not remember us with the least gratitude. The men actually dislike being seen talking to an American, for fear that it will hurt them politically."

Dr L. H. Bugbee, of New York, who is the almost exact double of President McKinley in appearance, came to Washington for the express purpose of seeing the man for whom he was so often mistaken. As the two men shook hands, the likeness was remarked by everyone present. After the interview, which was the first time Dr. Bugbee had met the President, he said: "It is a great honor to look like the President, but it is an awful annoyance to have people making the mistake all the time. In Washington, it is different from other cities. People do not bother me here except to peer curiously at me as I sit in the hotel or walk on the streets. Occasionally they lift their hats in dignified salute, but rarely molest me. Several have approached me to ask favors, practical jokers having told them that I was the President. In other cities, especially if the President happens to be in the same place, I have much trouble. Once or twice the police had to almost rescue me from mobs of curiosity seekers. I guess I look more like the President's photographs than like the President himself."

Secretary Root says the charges preferred against Colonel Heistand, adjutant-general of the army in China, in connection with an alleged combination of officials to control the hemp output of the Philippines, by General Hawkes, who was dismissed from the volunteer service for making corrupt use of his position, are unworthy of notice; that they place Hawkes in an ugly and unenviable position; if true, they show that he had tried to get into a corrupt combination, and if untrue, that he was guilty of a malicious attempt to injure an innocent man.

Communicated.

To the Editor of The Republican.

Occasions are rare where I have attempted to answer articles appearing in the editorials of the great news and political organs, but an article in the Oakland REPUBLICAN of Dec. 20 clipped from the Baltimore Sun, in which the editor says: "A country which recklessly gives away $140,000,000 yearly in pensions must, of course, be very rich, or the tax payers must be a very small factor in legislation. Possibly the explanation of the enormous annual waste in Federal, State and municipal expenditures is that it a tax eating and not a tax paying class that runs things calls forth the act."

I am a pensioner and one of about 2,500,000 who, when the tocsin of war proclaimed danger to our free institutions and the probable disintegration of our federal compact responded to the call of the federal authority, to her loyal sons, to take up arms with a view if possible to save it and preserve the peace, the honored name and flag of our beloved land, which tottered on the the verge of destruction, by the hand of the incensed but mistaken South, and it would be a wanton waste of time to elaborate on the excellent results of the success of our arms now being felt, not only in our own great and prosperous country, but reaching out like the limbs of the cedar of Lebanon to shelter and protect the downtrodden and misruled people of the world and being guided by the spirit which dominated in those days of trouble, our several Republican administrations intervening that time and the present, have not a parallel in the annals of history, ancient or modern, save of their own wise, conservative yet firm legislation, and the administrations being in close touch and sympathy with both branches of the legislative bodies, few mistakes have been made and none of a serious nature; and the laws under which we are now receiving only a part of what we were promised in the days when our country's destiny trembled in the balance were enacted during the years between 1861 and 1900 by those bodies and approved by the administrations. Does the Sun know that in the beginning of that terrible conflict the bravest young men and youth of the land were the first to respond to the call to arms, both North and South, and rushed with that pride and fearless spirit that only Americans do into bloodiest conflicts and endured all other exposure and hardship entailed in armies with heroic zeal akin to desperation and without cavil or complaint — the Southern armies in defense of their mistaken cause and Northern armies with a knowledge of the awful consequences of a dissolution of the Union. We outnumbered them and after four years of the hardest fought and bloodiest battles recorded in history we accomplished what we undertook, and the country is today enjoying just what the sacrifice we made gave it—a united country, a republic governed in peace, a financial system equal to any under the sun, and above all unlimited resources for a hundred generations to come.

Does the editor of the Sun also know that the value of the greenback dollar was measured by the lenders of gold to the government, by their measure of belief in the government's ability to sustain itself, and that in the summer of 1864 they demanded and received $2.85 in greenbacks for $1.00 in gold? Does he also know that the difference between the greenback we received in payment for our services and the one the lenders received, exclusive of the interest, amounts to more than the whole amount of pensions paid since the close of the war, every dollar of which has been paid in gold, together with the accrued interest; or, in short, his dollar in value averaged about two and one-fourth times more than ours?

And now, veterans, who may read the facts stated here, beware of the leaven of that fickle organ, the Baltimore Sun, whose columns will tolerate such ill-fitting and unqualified statements, whose venom, if possible, would fasten stigma on the veterans because of the small pensions so deservingly paid us and on the chosen functionaries of our government for legislation in our our favor. And whatever you have done in the past in the future, when he painteth in gaudy and delusive colors a biographical sketch of his friend and holdeth him or his principles up in an editorial for your approval or painteth your friends in repulsive colors for your condemnation, be not deceived thereby, for at last he biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder.

On Her Mind.

Recently, while Rev. J. Ed. Kildow, was located in Tucker county, he was up Dry Fork one Sunday delivering an address to a Sabbath school and was called upon while there to marry a young couple, which he did. Immediately after the ceremony the superintendent called upon all present to recite a scripture quotation. When he called on the bride she arose and in an absent minded manner repeated the passage, "Suffer little children to come unto me." This brought down the house and broke up the Sunday school and knocked out Rev. Kildow so badly that he at once packed up and left the county. We haven't heard from the groom yet and don't know whether he got away or not.—Kingwood Argus.

It would be well for householders to be on the lookout for petty thieves and give them a warm reception when caught about the premises. The vagabonds are as a rule more able to work than the people they seek to rob.

The banks notes for the First National Bank have been received from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and are being signed by Mr. Fred. A. Thayer, president, and Mr. U. G. Palmer, cashier. They will be put in circulation shortly.

A recent order promulgated by the Postoffice department at Washington makes Oakland the turning point for railway clerks running on train No. 4 from Cincinnati. Arriving here the clerks, three in number, register in a book kept for that purpose at the station and remain here until the following morning, when they leave on train No. 3.

Twelve complete sets of scenery, over two thousand square yards, all on a magnificent scale, and adjustible to any sized stage, are carried by the Frank Davidson company. This assures absolute scenic perfection to each of the plays presented, and will virtually make a new stage in our Opera House; all of the stock scenery being removed. Such a display of mechanical effect was never before attempted and is said to be alone worth seeing. The dates are Jan. 17, 18 and 19.

It has been reported to us that a young man living near town who does not enjoy the blessings of a clear brain, went into a certain public place in Oakland some days ago and was there subjected to an assault of a very aggravating nature. It is alleged that he was thrown upon the floor and some highly inflammable substance poured upon him which was set on fire, burning his face and neck very badly. The perpetrators of the "joke", as it had been termed, are fearing criminal prosecution.

At the annual election of officers for the Sunday school of St. Paul's M. E. church in Oakland, Rev. John M. Davis was re-elected Superintendent for the 35th consecutive year. Friday, December 21st, was the shortest day of the year. The days will be about the same length for some time and they will gradually lengthen until spring. There is an old saying "as the days lengthen the cold strengthens." This is usually true as winter sets in in earnest after the holidays if not before.

The members and friends of St. Paul's M. E. church on Monday night tendered a donation to the pastor, Rev. Asbury Mick. The occasion was one of great enjoyment to both the donors and recipients. After the articles had been delivered to the pastor a watch night service was begun and ended with the ringing in of the new year as well as the new century.

Mr. Eli McMillan, formerly of Accident, writes us from Washington, ordering his paper mailed there where he will reside during the winter. He states that he has had a pleasant time visiting friends and relatives in Pennsylvania and enjoyed himself accordingly where he spent a month after leaving Accident, and that now he is at the Capital City ready to take in the sights. Mr. McMillan is, we are happy to say, one of our warmest personal friends and his enjoyment is a real pleasure to us. May he live long and prosper!

Theatre goers differ largely in taste. Some enjoy drama, some orchestral music, some band music, some are appealed to more strongly by specialties, songs, dances, etc. Others are reached through the eye, beautiful scenery, elaborate stage settings, elegant costumes, correct colorings and artistic groupings please them above all else. The attraction gathering together and presenting all these things in a first-class manner is the one that will please everybody. The Frank Davidson Company has done this very thing, and is reaping a harvest. They will be at the Opera House for three nights beginning Thursday evening, January 17 and the people of this city will be with them.

Messrs. H. L. Grant and Samuel Lawton, the Oakland art photographers, have purchased a projectoscope and will give entertainments at points along the lines of the Baltimore and Ohio and the West Virginia Central railways. The class of picturis shown will deal particularly with the agricultural, mining and lumber industries of the country lying adjacent to the Baltimore and Ohio railway with the view of attracting new industries and developing the country. The matter is endorsed by the industrial department of the B. & O.—in fact it being originated by the department. The first entertainment will be given to-night at Tunnelton and on Saturday night an exposition will be given in Baltimore to the officials of the B. & O.

Mr. and Mrs. William A. Brydon and son, formerly of Bloomington, but now residing at Baltimore, spent last Thursday in Oakland as guests of Mr. and Mrs. D. E. Offutt.

As the observers drew near, Tom with flushed face and clenched fists, was confronting another boy and counting rapidly. "I promised my mother,"—he said—"six, seven, eight—I'd never get into a fuss with any other feller—nine, ten, 'leven, twelve—till I'd counted twenty-five—thirteen, fourteen—you dirty-faced, ugly, mean, curly toothed scrub—fifteen, sixteen, seventeen, eighteen—I can lick you in two seconds and you know it—nineteen, twenty, twenty-one—you're nothing but a low down—twenty-two, twenty-three, twenty-four, twenty-five—biff!" And the fight was on.

More Activity in Coal Lands.

For the past several months options on all available coal fields in the southeren end of this county have been taken quietly by capitalists from New York, Philadelphia and other cities which had the effect of stimulating business in this particular line to a great extent. The base of operations has been changed now to the northern end of the county where options are being taken on lands in and about the Cove, Grantsville and the surrounding country. Should these lands be developed quite a boom will be experienced in this county.

Garrett county is rich in minerals and with these developed along with additional transportation facilities now under construction along Casselman river her wealth as well as population will be materially increased.

HE UNFOLDS A PLAN WITH MILLIONS IN IT TO A CREDITOR.

Major Crofoot Doesn't Succeed In Convincing His Wealthy and Skeptical Visitor, but Does Manage to Stand Him Off Once Again.

[Copyright, 1900, by C. B. Lewis.]

As the man turned into the doorway leading up to Major Crofoot's office he had a look of determination on his face. As he ascended the well worn stairs his tread showed aggressiveness. As he banged the major's door open and entered he had the air of a creditor who'd get his money or carry away his pound of flesh. The major was in. He sat at his desk smoking a very short stub of cigar, but as the door opened he whirled with a bland smile on his face, and, rising, with both hands held out, he exclaimed:

"Well, now, but this is truly a coincidence—a coincidence! Come right in, my dear fellow—come right in!"

"Oh, I'll come in fast enough," answered the caller as he suited the action to the words and came to a halt in the middle of the room. "Now, then, no more skulking and dodging. You owe me $10 borrowed money, and I want it right off the reel."

"AS THE WHEELS TURN A MOUTH ORGAN PLAYS."

"My dear Mr. Shine," said the major as he took a last puff at his stub, "you formerly had an office next door. We became acquainted. You learned that I was temporarily embarrassed, and, sizing me up as an honest, ambitious man, who would ultimately overcome his bad luck, you kindly forced a $10 bill upon me one day."

"I deny it!" shouted Mr. Shine. "Why, hang it, you were annoying me every day for a month before I let you have the money, and you told me a thousand lies to get it!"

"When you so kindly forced that money upon me," continued the major as he smiled and walked, "I said to myself that some day I would repay you a thousandfold. It was your trust, your confidence, in me that touched me. I was almost unknown to you. For all you knew I might be a deadbeat. You had only your judgment to go on, but your judgment was right. This very morning I should have telegraphed you to call in."

"Oh, you are going to pay, eh?"

"Major Crofoot always pays his debts, sir, and in some cases he returns $100 for $1. It will be so in this case. I could have paid you back long ago, but was waiting to make it a memorable occasion for you. The time has arrived. My dear fellow, let us shake hands."

"What for? You owe me $10. You say you are going to pay it. I don't see the object of shaking hands."

"Yes, you truly cast your bread upon the waters," said the major as he paced the width of the room and looked into vacancy, "and I am pleased that your returns will be so great. Do you know I love a man who trusts to my honor and integrity? Let a man show his confidence in me, and I would sell my shirt for him. Yes, you kindly forced $10 upon me, and"—

"And now you kindly force it back again," interrupted Mr. Shine. "It's no use dodging, old man. I'm here for my money and am going to have it."

"My dear fellow, you are one of the few who trusted to my integrity when I was down on my luck, and I therefore pass over your hard words now. You haven't heard of the Great American Combination Baby Carriage company, have you?"

"No, sir."

"Because it is just being incorporated and we are taking the greatest care not to let anything get out until we are ready. My own creation, sir, and the biggest thing of the decade. If we don't make a million dollars out of it the first year, I shall be more than surprised. I wouldn't take half a million in cash for my chances."

"That's all blamed nonsense!" shouted Mr. Shine as he began to bristle up. "I know you, you old soft soaper! You want to dodge that $10, but I'll have it before I leave!"

"My own inventive idea, as I told you, and it will astonish the world. The baby carriage can be changed into a cradle, a hammock or a sled by moving a lever. Good for summer or winter, you see. Is provided with a stationary milk bottle, a whistle and a rattlebox. Has an ice chest and a soothing sirup department. As the wheels turn a mouth organ plays. Provided with a patent brake, rubber tires and a mothproof cover; also has revolving fans to keep the flies away. After the baby gets out of long dresses he can use the carriage as a tricycle. That's the invention, Mr. Shine. Organized on a capital of $750,000, and shares to be sold at par. There's more than millions in it."

"I don't care a rap if there is. What I want is my $10, and I'll give you just five minutes to shell out."

"I was going to offer you the secretaryship," softly observed the major, "but the salary will be only ten thousand a year. What I shall offer you and what I was going to telegraph you about as you came in was the purchasing agency. We shall want a man to buy the milk and soothing sirup and see that they are pure. The salary will be at least $15,000 per year, with perquisites thrown in. My dear man, you trusted me. This is your reward. Now will you shake?"

"Not by a durned sight!" shouted Mr. Shine as he bobbed around. "None of this sort of rot will stand me off on my $10. Do you want me to take it out of your hide?"

"And you can buy stock at par, my dear fellow—stock that will be worth 150 inside of four weeks. I have arranged for that. That stock will pay you at least 100 per cent. Invest $10,000, and you have an income of $25,000 per year. That's what comes of trusting to the integrity of Major Crofoot. Is it enough? If not, just say so, and I'll add $5,000 from my salary as president."

Mr. Shine deliberately removed his coat and vest and flung them on a chair.

"Or if you want to borrow $10 for a day or two you can have it and welcome. I'll just step out and get it for you."

The major stepped, and Mr. Shine removed his collar, tie and cuffs. Then he spat on his hands and limbered up his arms and waited. He waited for half an hour—two hours. Then he got up and redressed himself and kicked over the chairs and desk and went out. The major had stood him off once more. M. QUAD.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Many Things of Which Its Graduates Are Ignorant.

The failure of the Sunday school as a means of giving a systematic and thorough knowledge of the Bible is great. A teacher in a city high school asked an advanced class of 40 or 50 pupils, who had been drilled for years in the International Sunday School Lessons, how to proceed in order to reach Palestine, and not one could give the desired information. Then she asked the class in what part of the world Palestine is located, and no one knew.

That is a very good specimen of Sunday school teaching and can be paralleled anywhere by those who will take the trouble to ask a few questions. The ignorance of the Bible on the part of most persons of average intelligence is something amazing. The simplest questions will elicit no answer on the part of most such persons.

That educated persons know something about the Bible may be assumed, but not unless the training goes much beyond the standard of the common school. Again and again it has transpired that those who were generally well informed, who were fairly well educated and regarded as bright and clever, were almost totally ignorant of the Bible. Their Sunday school training had given them no knowledge of the book that was of any value, and, however much they might have read it since, it was to them a sealed volume.—Boston Transcript.

Giving Him a Rest.

The energy of one of the oldest inhabitants of a Massachusetts town is a byword among his neighbors and a trial to his grandchildren, who have not inherited their full share of his active temper.

His grandson John in particular suffers from the old man's untiring industry, for John is his assistant in the little grocery shop, where everything, from codfish to brooms, may be found. A purchaser of gingersnaps lingered one day to hear the noontime address delivered to poor John by his grandfather.

"Now, Johnny, I'm a-going home for my dinner," said the old man briskly, "and on the way I'll carry up these pails to Miss Manson and fetch back her kerosene can. I shall be gone up'ards of half an hour. You'll have plenty of time to eat your luncheon, and while you're resting after that I wish you'd saw up that little mess of wood that lays out by the back door and split it up for stove kindling, for the weather's turning sharp a'ready.

"Most likely I'll be back 'fore you get out o' work, and anyways I don't want to keep you at it all the time, so if there's a few extry minutes jest set down and make out a bill or two. The fust of the month'll be upon us 'fore we know it."—Youth's Companion.

Helping the Enemy.

A coal heaver was getting in a load of coal in the suburbs of London. He was shoveling in the coals at a good rate when he was startled by a terrific yell from the house adjoining.

"Wot the dickens is the matter?" queried the coalman, starting up.

A disheveled looking individual made his appearance at the door.

"Matter, you thickhead!" shouted the man, frantically endeavoring to pull his hair up in clots by the roots, "you are putting the coal down the wrong hole. My wife's people live there!"—London Tit-Bits.

His Limit.

"I'm getting along," said Mr. Cumrox. "I'm progressing slowly, but surely."

"In what?"

"Culture. I've been traveling around with Mrs. C. and the girls until I'm getting right refined. But there's one thing I don't think I'll achieve. I don't believe I'll ever be able to go into an antique store and tell the difference between bric-a-brac and junk."—Washington Star.

"Opportune" once signified nothing more than "to be at the harbor." An opportune ship was a ship which had come to port.

COMMUNITY SHOCKED.

The Dead Body of Col. Theodore Luman Found—Head Bruised and Neck Broken.

Monday's Cumberland Times.

There was intense excitement in this city this morning when it became known that Col. Theodore Luman, clerk of the Circuit Court, had been missing from home since 1 o'clock Sunday afternoon, at which time he started out to take a walk, telling the family not to wait dinner on him.

Not returning to his home the family made known the fact this morning when at once a searching party was instituted, which resulted in the finding of the body shortly after 11 o'clock this morning at the foot of what is known as "Devil's Slide," 2½ miles down the river, nearly opposite Wiley's ford, or at a point between the Alaska, W. Va., road and the river. His head was badly mashed and his neck broken. There was two or three hundred people searching for Mr. Luman when the body was found by Mr. Douglas LeFevre.

The remains were at once taken in charge by Undertaker Butler. The body having been found on the West Virginia side of the river, Dr. Carpenter was notified for the purpose of having an inquest held.

Dr. Carpenter, the coroner for Mineral county, West Virginia, upon viewing the remains turned them over to Col. Luman's friends and they were at once taken across the river in a boat and placed in charge of Undertaker Butler, who removed them to the establishment, where he is now preparing them for burial.

All of the valuables Col. Luman usually carried with him were found upon his person, and even a pink carnation, which he had worn in his buttonhole on yesterday, was found beside him, and his watch was running and in time. Dr. Brace, who was among the first to reach the body, says that death was caused by a blow received upon Col. Luman's head by falling a distance of 60 feet, and that the other injuries resulted from the continuous sliding of the body from that point to the bottom of the cliff, where it was found.

Tuffs of hair and blood were found upon the projecting rock just below the point at which the Colonel stood when he fell, and it is evident that Dr. Brace's statement is correct.

A Chestnutting Ghost

By Margaret Barringer.

"I CALL it downright mean, boys." "So do I, so do I, but what's that to him. He don't care a snap what we think of him. Well, we can show him there are more ways than one to make him care."

Tom Winslow was the leader among his friends, and what he said usually carried weight. The three boys were walking arm in arm from school, kicking the rustling leaves before them. They were greatly interested in the subject under discussion, and the lovely blue sky and twitter of birds on the mild October afternoon were lost to them.

"I'll tell you, boys. Let's go over to the house, out by the grape arbor, and talk this thing over. No one will catch a word, and I have a plan," suggested Tom.

The conference was held that afternoon and a plan laid which the boys were to carry out the next night. Tom was spokesman, and he talked earnestly between grapes.

"Now, this is my plan: We all have air guns, and there's plenty of good shot, and if we can't climb over his fence because of that great bulldog we can spoil his apples for him. We'll get Jim, Harry and Lou, and with ours there will be six guns. We can take some short ladders and climb up far enough to shoot, and we'll just pepper those apples so full of shot he won't have a tooth left if he tries to eat one. It's good moonlight, and we can see to aim pretty straight, and old bully can have a dose, too."

Mr. Brown, against whom this plot was laid, was a bachelor and a man of means, but was very close-fisted, and he showed his penurious spirit by never offering an apple to anyone, although the trees were loaded. The boys had even asked for a little fruit, but were refused, and soon after a high board fence with a barbed wire along the top was built around the orchard; and, what was worse, a surly bulldog took up his abode at Mr. Brown's.

The trio seemed to think the plan a fine one, and all ate another bunch of grapes to seal the compact. Mrs. Winslow called supper, and Bert and Ernest were invited to stay. This was an unexpected pleasure and always a treat, as the Winslow home was full of good cheer and welcome, especially to the boys of Medeville.

After tea Grandpa Winslow said:

"About nutting time, isn't it, boys? This warm weather won't last long. We'll have a frost one of these nights, and then hurrah for the hickories! That reminds me;" the boys nudged one another and winked sly winks, and grandpa had a merry twinkle in his blue eyes.

"Next to my father's farm," resumed the old man, "when I was about your age, there lived a man by the name of Silas Holmes, and he was as 'mean as dirt,' we used to say. He was honest enough and a good worker, but as stingy as people were ever made. We boys grew to hate Silas, and not without reason, for he watched us day and night, for fear we might somehow coax a melon or an apple over the fence.

"He seemed to gloat over the idea that he alone raised and ate chestnuts. We boys got more angry each year, and finally things came to a crisis. One evening just at dusk I was going from the barn to the corncrib and I saw a figure in the melon patch; supposing it was father or Brother Jim, I went on, but on second thought turned back just in time to see Silas climbing the fence with a big watermelon under his arm. I called out: 'Good evening, Mr. Holmes,' and he called back: 'G'd evenin', Tommy.'

"I was dumfounded, but concluded to keep my counsel until Bill, my younger brother, and I got to bed. Then we talked the matter over and decided to wait until chestnuts were ripe and have our revenge in some way. October days soon came, with the dropping leaves and the yellow corn, and we were busy making jack o' lanterns to light the barn, for we were to have the annual corn-husking bee at our place. All hands were set to work that day; the old barn was swept and great boughs hung about the sides and from the rafters, and the pumpkin men never shone so brightly.

"We had laid our plans, Bill, Jack Hardy, who lived the other side of Silas, and myself. Of course Silas would be at the husking, and as the women were all busy getting the supper his daughter, Sally, would be over early to help. We all liked Sally; she kept house for her father. Yes, she was a good girl, but she had to toe the mark. About eight o'clock the folks began to come, and by nine o'clock the barn was full. Supper was announced about 11 o'clock, and then came our chance.

"We stole away to the corncrib, where we had hidden our bags, and then crept back of the barn, through the melon patch, across Silas' garden to the other side of the house, over the fence and away across a field to where six big chestnuts stood, with the moonlight streaming over their heads. We decided that Jack should climb the tree and shake, while we filled our bags, and then one of us would take his place and the other help him fill his. We were getting on finely, when we were startled by a noise, not an unusual one, but a sound resembling a moan, then all was quiet.

"'Give us another shake, Jack,' I called; 'then I'll come up.' I had no sooner said it than a louder moan came from near by. We were frightened by this time, and Billy whispered: 'A ghost!'

"'Pshaw!' I said, 'ghosts don't make a noise, and there is no such thing, anyway,' and I bravely turned my head and looked about us. There it was, coming slowly towards us—white and specter-like—moving steadily from tree to tree, and you can imagine our hearts were thumping lively. 'Billy,' I said, getting close to him, 'hang on to your bag and we'll run.' I called to Jack, softly: 'Come on, Jack; drop quick, and you can have half my nuts.'

"Before he could answer we heard some one sobbing, and soon a voice called out: 'Oh, boys, come quick! I'm so sorry, so sorry!'

"This was no ghost, but Sally, holding Jack's head in her lap and trying to revive him. He had fallen from the tree and broken his arm in his hurry to follow us, and, frightened nearly to death at being left alone with the ghost, had fainted. Sally then told her story. She had overheard us boys talking one day and knew of our plan to 'coon' the nuts, and thought she would have some fun out of it.

"We all went home feeling glad Jack's accident was no worse. Sally told a straight story to her people, saying we all went over to her house and Jack fell from a tree. The doctor was there and set his arm, and he was our hero, but no one knew of our ghost and the stolen nuts."

"Is that all?" asked Tom.

"No," Grandpa Winslow said, "there's a sequel. At Christmas time we were all invited to Silas Holmes' to dinner, an unheard of thing, and we went with wonder and curiosity sticking out all over us. There was a big turkey and all sorts of good things, and in the center of the table a great dish of chestnuts, but they were not disturbed until evening, when we were all invited into the great kitchen, and Silas said while we roasted chestnuts he would tell us a tale. Then he told of how when he was a boy he fell in the creek and our father jumped in and helped him out, and another time when he grew up his house burned, and father and mother took him with his wife and Sally into their own home, and kept them until his house was rebuilt. Then when Mrs. Holmes died, leaving Sally a little girl, mother used to care for her and helped him get along until she was old enough to do the work herself, and so he rambled on.

"Father spoke up and said: 'There, there, Silas, that will do.' We wondered what was coming. Silas took the big dish of nuts and asked father to empty them on the hearth and as the nuts rolled out a big, yellow envelope fell on top of the pile. Father picked it up and on it was written: 'A Merry Christmas, from Sally and Silas.'

"Some years before this father had met with misfortune and was obliged to put a mortgage on our home. We boys knew the struggle he was having, and how mother was growing sad.

"I'M SO SORRY, SO SORRY."

There seemed only trouble ahead of us all. Silas said as father held the envelope: 'You boys, I know, have thought I was mean about the nuts, but I decided long ago to devote the proceeds of the sale of the chestnuts to my one desire—to in some way show my appreciation of your father's kindness to me. This money was all extra to me and I would not miss it, so Sally and I have carefully hoarded the nuts, not eating them ourselves. They are scarce about here and bring a good price, and I am the happiest man in the county this Christmas morning to be able to say to you, Joseph, that your home is clear.'

"Father had sunk into a chair and mother had drawn her chair close to Sally and they both cried, of course, but we boys gave one big cheer for Uncle Si, and I know he was as glad as we, and more so.

"But what about that melon he stole?" asked Tom.

"Oh, yes, the melon. "Why, I found out soon after that Sally had asked father for it, as she had company come unexpectedly, and Silas went to get it, and never dreamed I thought anything wrong of it. Then, too, about the ghost, Sally told Silas our plan and they needed the nuts to finish the payment and took that way to keep them, you see. We always liked Uncle Si after that, and we always had all the nuts we could eat and, what was better, we learned that we should not judge people by their seemingly unpleasant or rough exterior, for often underneath the surface there is a warm and tender heart."

There was silence for a time, and grandpa wondered if the boys guessed why he told the story or that he had been behind the grape arbor.

"I don't believe we had better buy any more shot, do you, Tom?" asked Ernest.

"No. Say, weren't Silas and Sally bricks?"—Detroit Free Press.

THE USEFUL ANGORA.

Its Value Is Just Beginning to Be Appreciated Here.

Many Western Farmers Are Now Breeding These Charming Goats to Clear Land and for Milk, Hair and Hide.

The problem of clearing the land from which trees have been removed and of exterminating the persistent growth of shrubbery has been solved by a Texas farmer, whose chief aid in the enterprise is the goat. A man who has studied the subject, speaking of the work done by the browsing goat, said that the animal shows his generosity by giving his relation, the sheep, an equal share of the pasture, and magnanimously turns over to the sheep all the rich and succulent grasses. The goat also acts as the protector of the sheep.

"We have never given the goat his just deserts," said the expert, "and have failed to give him credit for his moral worth and his physical usefulness. In Roquefort, France, the dairymen combine the milk of the sheep and of the goat in making the most delicious cheese, which we import at four times the price of our own dairy cheese, however excellent. We also import millions of kidskins, tanned and in French gloves, for both of which we pay high prices, to the detriment of home industries."

Near Kansas City a man has taken advantage of the Texan's discovery and has started to clear up with Angora goats a thousand acres of brushwood.

The value of the goat seems to be appreciated by the residents of the western states, a fact which was demonstrated at the fair of the American Angora association, which took place last month in Kansas City. About 3,000 goats were exhibited. They came from Kansas, Iowa, Texas, Missouri and New Mexico, and among them were some of the finest specimens in the country. Many people who visited the fair had never seen an Angora goat before, and all listened attentively to the papers which were read on the subject of the dainty animal and its habits, traits and peculiarities.

One breeder from Missouri said that the presence of the goats in his pastures afforded him ample compensation for his investment in a flock of 600 or 700. "Under the foot of the Angora," he said, "a rich carpet of blue grass has already covered what before was a bare, forbidding land surface, marred by many clumps of briars and bushy growths." These bad places had been done away by the goats, and the pastures had become picnic grounds. This was only the poetry of the industry, but other speakers were equally enthusiastic in discussing the economic points. It was asserted that the Angora goat was immune from tuberculosis, that its milk was consequently pure, and that the flesh as a food article was wholesome, and that Angora venison was a delicious food. Other points of which the breeders make much are the Angora hair, which is coming more into demand every year, and the tanned pelt, which is a good substitute for buckskin.

A Poor Town for Lovers.

A case which came before the Milan police court the other day amusingly illustrates the maxim "other times, other manners." There is among the city statutes a law rigorously prohibiting all kisses or other amatory demonstrations in public places as being contrary to morals. This statute, though dating from the days of the Sforzas, is still so strictly enforced that only the other day a pair of perfectly respectable lovers were taken before the tribunal for merely exchanging an embrace in a quiet corner of the park when they thought nobody was looking. Upon this case a city Solomon adjudged that though kissing under such circumstances could not be considered contrary to morals, it was not consistent with the ideals of advanced civilization as to decorum. A fine of 12 shillings was inflicted.

A Strange Medical Case.

A curious case has occurred in one of the Paris hospitals, which is exciting much comment in medical circles. Some time ago a woman named Legros, 55 years of age, was found lying in a road in a state of insensibility and absolutely rigid. She was removed by the police to the hospital, where for three weeks she remained in the same state. The doctors then decided that she was dead, and had been so since she was found, the preservation of her body being due to the amount of alcohol she had imbibed.

AMERICAN INDIANS.

They Are Now Nearly as Numerous as They Were in the Time of Columbus.

The remarkable statement that the Indian population of the United States to-day is little diminished from what it was in the time of Columbus, Coronado, Raleigh, Capt. Smith and other early explorers is the chief feature of the annual report of Commissioner of Indian Affairs William A. Jones.

The report disputes positively the commonly accepted theory that, by constant contact with the whites, the extinction of the Indian is only a matter of time. The commissioner declares with emphasis that his research from the most reliable data obtainable proves that the red men are not decreasing in numbers. Since 1870, the time of the first reliable Indian census, the population has been stationary, the only decrease being attributable to Indians becoming citizens of the United States, says a Washington report.

The total expenditure by the government on account of the Indian service from March 4, 1789, up to and including July 30, 1900, was $368,358,217. The expenditures for the fiscal year ended last July amounted to $10,175,107. Of this amount at least $3,330,000 was devoted to the cause of Indian education.

Under the head of obstacles to self-support of the Indians the report deprecates the ration system, annuity payments and the leasing of allotments. The ration system, says the report, is the corollary of the reservation system. The Indian population of the United States is about 267,900, of which 45,270 receive a daily ration. The ration issued and its value vary according to the tribe. Nearly two-fifths of the number receiving rations belong to the great Sioux nation. The ration has been reduced gradually in the last few years, in accordance with the policy of the Indian bureau. If the Indians' claim for full rations as a right is conceded the commissioner predicts that the time when they will be self-supporting lies in the distant future, if it comes at all.

Altogether, there are 57,570 Indians receiving subsistence in some degree, exclusive of Indian children in boarding schools. The commissioner urges that the indiscriminate issue of rations should stop at once. The old and helpless, he says, should be provided for, but rations should be issued to the able-bodied only for labor, while those who have been educated in Indian schools should depend entirely upon their own resources.

There is now in the treasury to the credit of Indian tribes $33,315,955.09, drawing interest at the rate of four and five per cent., the annual interest amounting to $1,646,485.96. Besides this, several of the tribes have large incomes from leasing and other sources.

Two suggestions are made regarding the trust fund. They are: First, the gradual extinction of these funds, setting aside a sufficient sum to maintain the reservation schools a definite period of years, say 21, and then dividing the balance per capita and paying all members of the tribe at certain ages their share. Second, division of the land belonging to the tribe per capita. The subject of Indian schools also is discussed at some length.

NOT PLEASED WITH ROME.

A Kansas Man Who Was There Smashes the Idols of the Eternal City.

Here is a Missouri idol smasher who has the courage of his convictions in the matter of "speaking his mind," at any rate, says the Kansas City Journal. A Grundy county man, who is making a tour of Europe, "did Rome" one afternoon a few weeks ago with the following disastrous result, as described in his latest letter home:

"St. Peter's disappointed me. It is large enough, but too light and bare. The inside is of gray marble, and there is no stained glass. So it looks like an unfitted art gallery. The famous bronze statue of St. Peter, sitting in a chair, from which the toe has been kissed, would not catch your eye if it were not for the guide book. The great vatican palace is about as pretty as the brick row. It is very old, very irregular, and the pictures by Raphael and Michael Angelo were an utter disappointment to all of us. The Sistine chapel, in which M. Angelo's greatest paintings cover the walls and ceilings, is a large plain room. The pictures are all in a dark, purplish gray color, hard to make out and absurd when you do make them out. They remind me of rather plain and faded circus bills with the actors performing on the trapeze. Raphael's greatest pictures are rich in colors, but are not more interesting. He and Angelo never saw a naked woman or child, I guess, nor were ever even at Atlantic City. They give the children the muscles of a Roman gladiator or a Barnum strong man. The ruins of ancient Rome are also a great disappointment as a rule. With the exception of the wonderful Coliseum and a few more things all the rest are nothing but stone piles, so far as they appear to the common spectator."

Time Changes.

This is a baby. It is a girl baby. How sloppy its chin is! How red its eyes. What horrid contortions it makes with its face. See how savagely it kicks. How like a demon it yells!

Yet in a few short years some man will be half crazed with wild suspense, worshiping the very air this being breathes, devoutly kneeling at her feet and frantically begging for one word, one pressure of the hand, even a look, which will give him hope.—N. Y. World.

A NARROW ESCAPE. A GRATEFUL WOMAN.

MRS. F. J. LYNCH, GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

Mrs. F. J. Lynch, 324 South Division street, Grand Rapids, Mich., writes: The Peruna Medicine Company, Columbus, Ohio:

Gentlemen—"I earnestly recommend Peruna to any suffering women as it cures quickly. I had a most persistent cough which nothing seemed to cure. Two bottles of Peruna did more for me than all the doctors seemed to do. In a couple of weeks I found myself in excellent health, and have been enjoying it ever since. Hence I look on Peruna as a true friend to women." MRS. F. J. LYNCH.

Chronic Coughs and Colds Are Catarrhal Diseases.

Catarrh is the Continual Scourge of Christendom.

Catarrh hovers ominously over every city, and nestles treacherously in every hamlet. It flies with vampire wings from country to country, and casts a black shadow of despair over all lands. Its stealthy approach and its lingering stay makes it a dread to the physician and a pest to the patient.

It changes the merry laugh of childhood to the wheezy breathing of croup, and the song of the blushing maiden to the hollow cough of consumption. In its withering grasp the rounded form of the fond wife and mother becomes gaunt and spectral, and the healthy flush of manhood turns to the sallow, haggard visage of the invalid.

Cough takes the place of conversation, speech gives way to spitting, the repulsive odors of chronic catarrh poison the kiss of the fondest lovers, and thickened membranes bedim sight, impair hearing and destroy taste.

Like the plague-stricken Egyptians a cry of distress has gone out from every household, and the mildew of woe clings to every hearthstone.

Catarrh in some form, catarrh in some stage lurks as an enemy in the slightest cough or cold and finishes its fiendish work in heart disease and consumption.

No tissue, function, or organ of the body escapes its ravages; muscles wither, nerves shatter, and secretions dry up under its blighting presence. So stubborn and difficult is this disease that to invent a remedy to cure chronic catarrh has been the ambition of the greatest minds in all ages.

Is it therefore any wonder that the vast multitude of people who have been cured of chronic catarrh by Peruna are so lavish in their praise of this remedy? That the discovery of Peruna has made the cure of catarrh a practical certainty is not only the testimony of the people, but many medical men declare it to be true.

As a drug store in this age of the world is incomplete without Peruna, it can be obtained anywhere with directions for use. A complete guide for the prevention and cure of catarrh and all diseases of winter, sent free by The Peruna Medicine Co., Columbus, Ohio.

AN EMPTY WHISKY BARREL.

How Harry Dean Learned a Temperance Lesson When It Exploded.

"What is the use of learning all this stuff, anyway?" yawned ten-year-old Harry Dean, as he was trying to learn a lesson in his Temperance Physiology.

"The book explains for itself," said his mother.

"I don't believe half of it. Jimmy Lark is a saloonkeeper's son, and he says there is not a bit of truth in it. That silly people only put that into books to hurt the liquor trade."

"Is Jimmy Lark a proper person to listen to?"

"He says wicked words sometimes, and has awfully soiled hands, but he knows something about the liquor trade, and if he did not tell me, mamma, I could see some things for myself. Now, you say there has never been a drunkard in our family—and how is it going to hurt me if I leave it alone? I don't believe there is half so much poison in the stuff as this book says. If it is really such a dangerous poison I shouldn't think people would be allowed to make it, sell it, or anything."

"Nor they shouldn't, my son. You may depend on it, everything in the book is true, and then, not half the evil is told. But you are tired now. Put your book aside and go to the grocer's for me. Here is the order."

Harry Dean closed the book, took the slip of paper and started out.

It was a very hot day, and the street had a deserted look because it was the noon hour.

As he passed the corner of Fourth and Federal, he noticed a boy seated on an empty whisky barrel, under an awning, in front of a saloon. The boy was eating cherries.

As Harry was returning from the grocer's, he heard a loud report, and saw a boy flying into the air.

He ran with the others, and was one of the first to help up a bruised and bleeding boy. It was the one who had been sitting on the whisky barrel. He was hurried away to the hospital.

It was several days before the boy recovered from his wounds, and then he told how the accident happened.

After he had eaten his cherries, he began to wonder if there was anything in the barrel. In order to find out, he struck a match, dropped it through the bunghole into the barrel, and was just about to peer into the hole when there came a terrible explosion, and he bounced up against the awning and then out into the street.

"Why, the barrel was empty. How could it blow up?" Harry asked his mother, after narrating the event to her.

"That, my boy, is a lesson in natural philosophy. The barrel was full of poisonous gas, which the whisky left behind. The lighted match caused it to expand and explode. Is there no lesson to be learned in what you have seen?"

"Why, mamma, I was thinking if there is so much danger in an empty barrel where whisky has been, how much more there must be in a barrel full. I believe the books are right about alcohol burning up the stomach, and brain, and liver, and everything, and I never mean to taste a drop as long as I live. God never made alcohol, but wicked men made it, and I want none of it. I am so glad that temperance women introduced the study into the public schools, and I am just going to know it from begining to end before I am done with it."—Temperance Banner.

The Drink Curse in Austria.

The drink evil in Vienna has become so great that the authorities have declared in favor of closing all brandy shops on Sunday. From 1883 to 1893 the average annual consumption of beer in Austria rose from 50 to 63 liters (11 to 14 gallons) per head; wine, 15 to 18.5 liters; spirits, 5.4 to nine liters per head. In Vienna the consumption is much larger. In one month in 1899 within the police district of Vienna 694 persons were arested for drunkenness on Saturday, Sunday or Monday; 210 of these drank beer or wine, 475 spirits. The number of drunken cases in the year estimated at 8,000. There being no inebriate homes in Austria a large number of drunkards are found in lunatic asylums. In one of these 52 per cent. of males and six per cent. of women admitted were declared to have alcoholic madness.

In 1898 there were 177,000 drink shops in Belgium, or one for every 35 inhabitants. These figures do not include hotels, restaurants or small grocers.—National Advocate.

CIGARETTES AND SITUATIONS.

General Movement Throughout the Country Against Employing Those Addicted to Their Use.

That cigarettes are deadly poisonous is an absolute scientific fact. A physician made a solution of all the nicotine from one cigarette; one-half of it was injected into a full-grown frog, from the effects of which the frog died almost instantly; the other half was used upon another frog with the same result. The poison of the cigarette is as deadly to the human being as to the frog, but slower in its work. Diseases resulting from its use are well known to physicians. The same physician who experimented upon the frogs says that instead of the fancy pictures which accompany cigarette packages, each ought to bear a skull and crossbones and be marked "deadly poison," the same as other poisonous drugs.

Since Chief Moore issued his order a number of Chicago business houses have pursued the same course. The board of education does not permit cigarette smoking in its office; Montgomery Ward & Co. will not employ boys addicted to the use of cigarettes; bimonthly lectures on the evils of cigarette smoking are provided by Marshall Field & Co., for the benefit of their employes; the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad company has notified its employes that they must abandon cigarettes or forfeit their positions; several establishments have opened their doors to lecturers connected with the Anti-Cigarette league. The United States supreme court has declared the Chicago anti-cigarette law valid. Arkansas has an anti-cigarette bill which makes the sale or giving away of cigarettes to any person under any circumstances a misdemeanor, punishable by fine. That the civil service commission of New York city purposes to rid itself of "several hundred juvenile cigarette fiends," and substitute "office girls" is another straw that shows which way the wind blows.

The Anti-Cigarette league, with headquarters in the Woman's Temple, Chicago, is vigorously waging war against the cigarette. It is after the boys, and to further its work publishes a bright little paper entitled The Boy. School teachers are loud in their denunciations of the cigarette; their positions enable them to observe its effect and they have noted its viciousness. Men are assisting the league in its work and have secured from boys under their care pledges that they will not smoke cigarettes before they are of age. Antagonism to the cigarette is constantly increasing in force, and it is to be hoped that the earth will not have passed many milestones in the new century before the deadly "coffin nail" is relegated to obscurity.—Young People.

A FOOD OR A POISON?

Alcohol Cannot Play a Double Role—Tears Down But Does Not Build Up Tissue.

Kassowitz maintains that it is not so much a question as to whether alcohol per se is toxic or nutritive, for it can hardly be denied that it is an active poison capable of causing the death of any animal or vegetable protoplasm with which it comes in contact, but rather as to whether in spite of these injurious properties it can still be of value to the organism and serve to sustain it. A food stuff to be classed as such must not only be capable of supplying the organism with energy to be dissipated as heat and in the performance of work, but must also under proper conditions enter into the bodily structure and replace tissue that has become worn out. Recent investigation has shown clearly enough that alcohol is easily and abundantly oxidizable in the human body, but the mere proof that a substance is consumed in this way does not entitle it to rank as a food, and still less can this supposition be entertained if in addition it at the same time causes decomposition and destruction of living protoplasm. That alcohol does this is not to be doubted in view of the present knowledge of metabolic processes, and this granted, it is evident that a substance capable of destroying body tissue cannot also at the same time serve to build it up and replace damaged parts. Therefore the position that alcohol may play the double role of food and poison is untenable, and the sooner it is dropped from the list of drugs for internal administration the better it will be for physician and patient.—Medical Record.

What a Bottle of Whisky Did.

A South Australian paper made the following comment on the receipt of a little gift from an admirer of the journal:

"A present in the shape of a bottle of fine old Scotch whisky was kindly sent to the office at two p. m. on Thursday. Ten minutes past that hour not a dram of the liquor remained; ten seconds later the office boy had sold the bottle at the rag and bone shop next door. At 3:30 three men were charged with being drunk and disorderly.

"The editor of this paper returns thanks for the handsome gift, and would feel obliged if the donor of the whisky would send along 72s., a policeman's helmet, a new office boy, four panes of glass, a new street door knocker, and—no more whisky!"

Not a Helper.

Alcohol is not only not a helper of work, but it is a certain hinderer of work; and every man who comes to the front of a profession in London is marked by this one characteristic, that the more busy he gets the less alcohol he takes; and his excuse is: "I am very sorry, but I cannot take it and do my work."—The Late Sir Andrew Clark, M. D., Physician to the Queen.

GRAND OLD CHURCH.

New Yorkers Are Proud of Trinity and Its History.

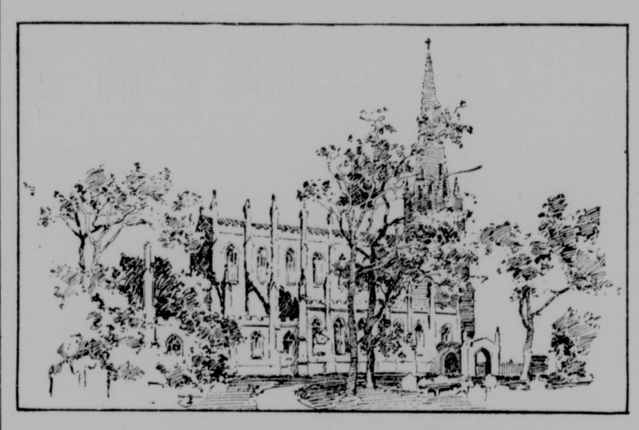
Famous Heroes and Statesmen Buried Where the Din of Traffic Is Almost Loud Enough to Arouse the Dead.

[Special New York Letter.]

FROM Wall street comes the roar of commerce. Just to the south, on New street, men are shouting themselves hoarse buying and selling stocks. From the Consolidated Stock exchange there comes a muffled sound like the rumbling of the sea. On Broadway there is a clatter of carts, a jangle of street car gongs and an everlasting, ceaseless human hum. There is a jungle of wagon spokes. There is a conglomerate mass of people reaching as far as the vision of the eye extends. It is pandemonium loose on earth without let or hindrance.

But at the head of Wall street, that great throbbing, golden thoroughfare of finance of America—on the west side of Broadway, that mighty highway of the people—in the midst of all the din, the confusion of tongues like unto which the confusion of Babel was as a summer song, a tall and stately spire arises as if to touch the sky. And amid all this traffic, the fiercest traffic of the greatest city of the new world, somber tombstones and tall shafts stand like silent sentinels guarding the dead who have slept for the centuries. If you listen you may hear the chimes in the belfry—soft and low, with melting tenderness—and you will forget the turmoil from the busy Broadway, and you will heed no more the shouts from Wall and from New streets. Before you is Trinity church. To the right and to the left of you is the graveyard where lie some of the heroes and the statesmen that have made an America a possibility for you and for me.

Just inside the gateway to the left the other day I saw an old sailor with a wooden leg. His cap was in his hand and he bowed his grizzled head in reverence before a polished granite shaft. One can almost read from the street the inscription to the memory of



TRINITY CHURCH, NEW YORK CITY.

Capt. James Lawrence. I followed the old man and saw him read on the east face of the monument:

> The heroic commander of the frigate Chesapeake whose remains are here deposited, expressed with his expiring breath his devotion to his country. Neither the fury of battle, the anguish of a mortal wound, nor the horrors of approaching death could subdue his gallant spirit. His dying words were: "Don't give up the ship."

Over to the south, half way between Broadway and New Church street is the small obelisk erected to the memory of Alexander Hamilton by the corporation of Trinity church. Near the head of the first path to the north is the grave of William Bradford, the publisher of the New York Gazette, the first newspaper printed in this city.

IN TRINITY CHURCHYARD.

He was born in Leicester, England, and came to this country in 1682 with William Penn. He set his press up in Philadelphia—the third in the colonies, but on account of political differences removed it to New York and on October 16, 1725, issued the first number of his paper. On his headstone is this quaint inscription:

Reader, reflect how soon you'll quit this stage;
You find but few attain to such an age.
Life is full of pain: Lo! Here's a Place of Rest,
Prepare to meet your God, then you are blest.

Trinity is the parent of the Episcopal church in the United States, and aside from its early associations with the beginning of New York is filled with historic interest. The first church in this country was in a little chapel near the Battery which had been vacated by the old Dutch church for larger quarters. Under William and Mary a grant was made, in 1697, of a parcel of land which was then described as near a street without the north gate of the city, commonly called Broadway. In 1705 a further grant was made of a tract of land known as Queen Anne's farm which lay along the North river between what are now Vesey and Christopher streets. It was to this last tract of land that the heirs of Anneka Jans Bogardus laid claim. It stretches clear up along Broadway and is to-day estimated to be worth fully $100,000,000. Trinity parish does not now possess these domains. Had it been able to foresee the wonderful growth of the city it would to-day be worth a fabulous fortune. As it is its wealth is now estimated to be about $5,000,000, with an annual income of $500,000. This income is expended not only in the support of the parish and its missionary work, but also in that of some 20 sister churches.

When the revolutionary war broke out Trinity church was loyal to the mother country. The rector having retired from the city, the pulpit was occupied by Mr. Inglis, who, notwithstanding the fact that one Sabbath morning 150 men with loaded muskets and fixed bayonets marched into the church, invoked the blessing of God upon "our most gracious sovereign, King George."

The present Trinity church is the third of that name to be built on the same site. The first one was accounted the finest church in the city in those days. Its first pastor was Mr. Vesey and the second Henry Barclay, after both of whom streets in that vicinity have been named. The first church was burned down and rebuilt in 1778, but in 1839 this structure was adjudged unsafe and it was torn down and the present building erected. This was completed in 1846.

Trinity church building is undoubtedly one of the finest specimens of Gothic architecture in the country. Despite the tall and wonderful buildings that have gone up in the last ten years it still remains clearly the most conspicuous and magnificent structure in the lower part of the city. It faces directly down Wall street as this thoroughfare opens into Broadway. It is constructed of brown stone and the groined roof is supported by rows of carved Gothic columns. The daylight enters through stained windows which soften and warm the rays into delicate tints. The altar and reredos are memorials of the late William B. Astor and were erected by his sons. The altar is of pure white marble with shafts of red upon which are capitals carved in foliated designs. The shafts are divided into panels on the front and sides, and the designs include passion flowers and a Maltese cross, in mosaic set with cameos, a Christ head and symbols of the Evangelists, flanked by two kneeling angels.

But it is the spire of Trinity that impresses one. It stretches far above up to a mere speck in the sky to a height of 284 feet. Some years ago the ascent of the steeple was one of the incidents of a visit to New York, but the custom has fallen into disuse, and indeed it is very difficult now to obtain a permit to climb to the top. The view, however, is one of the finest to be obtained in the city. One may look to the north up Broadway as far as Grace church, at the juncture of Tenth street. In fact Broadway is the only street that can be distinguished. Below the people look like ants. The street cars move in regular lines like bugs. In all directions is a sea of house-tops and chimney-pots—a desert of roofs; a forest of dwellings from the quaint squat Dutch brick that is still in evidence to the shapely thing of granite and marble. Away to the west is the North river, sparkling like a cloth of gold. Wharves line the shore and great ocean vessels, and little tugs, and white sails, and launches are hurrying here and there. On the other side one may see plainly the roofs and the church spires in Jersey City and Hoboken, with the Orange mountains and the Jersey Highlands beyond. Then, with a sweep to the south, is the glistening harbor of New York with the green islands and the statue of liberty, with arm upraised like a guardian angel over all, and then the Narrows, and in the distance Sandy Hook and the ocean. Eastward there is the inevitable Wall street, running like a cowpath to East river, which leads us on to the Long Island shore with the swelling Brooklyn heights rounding out the view.

Below us is that wasp nest; that mass of struggling humanity; some fighting for fame, some for gold, some for bread. Here we are above the maddening throng. The chimes are striking now. We are at peace in Old Trinity.

FREDERICK BOYD STEVENSON.

TRAMPS IN CHICAGO.

Many Who Are Used to the City Always Return for the Winter Months.

The tramps are coming back to Chicago to go into winter quarters. It used to be that with the approach of snow and ice the tramp winged his flight with the wild duck to the sunny southland. The tramp would explain his migration by saying he did not like snowballs as a steady diet, says the Chicago Tribune. But the tramp found that while there was plenty of sunshine and balmy breezes during the winter months in the southland, yet sunshine and balmy breezes were also far from fattening and that the opportunities for picking up sustenance during the weary winter months were much better in a big city than in the south. A large proportion of tramps continue to go south yet with the coming of the first frost, but a constantly increasing number each year turn their wandering footsteps toward the big cities, where a bed in the cheap lodging houses may be had for a dime and where philanthropic citizens with dimes may be had on the boulevards.

The tramps that come to Chicago in the winter do not remain at a permanent address during the cold months. Some of them live in the basements of deserted buildings and others occupy quarters in box cars on the side tracks in the railroad yards. In a yard in Eighteenth street are a large number of abandoned traction engines that were used last winter by the tramps as their homes. Old street cars shoved out behind car barns and left to decay are also quietly confiscated by tramps and used until the barn boss drives them away.

On extremely cold nights, when the box cars and the traction engines are cheerless and gloomy, the tramps walk the streets until they can collect the price of a bed at a lodging house, and failing to raise the necessary amount, they take refuge in the police stations. The policemen send them downstairs to the big room in front of the cells. They spread newspapers on the floor, and then lie down and sleep peacefully until morning. Every genuine hobo carries a piece of soap and a newspaper. On the rare occasions when they perform their ablutions they scorn to use any soap except their own, and they never think of lying down to their rest at night without spreading their newspapers under them. Tramps know the value of paper in keeping out cold, and sometimes an apparently thinly-clad tramp will have newspapers judiciously stuffed in his clothing in lieu of underwear.

The tramp usually dines in the winter months at the cheap saloons in Clark street and in Halsted and West Madison streets, where for five cents paid for a large vase of beer they are permitted to stand in front of the lunch counter and harpoon the tempting viands there displayed until the hoarse-voiced bouncer moves down upon them and demands: "Well, d'ye' tink dis is de Palmer house? How much perwisions d'y' think yer bought wid dat five cents?"

In the cheap lodging houses the tramps can find a bed for prices varying from five cents to twenty-five cents. The customary prices in the majority of the cheap lodging-houses are 10 and 15 cents. In the early part of the evening the big front rooms of the lodging-houses, which correspond to the corridors of the high-priced hotels in Michigan avenue, is filled by a miscellaneous crowd, among whom are many tramps and who sit as close to the red-hot stove as possible. As the evening passes on those of the crowd who have ten cents seek their beds. At ten o'clock a big red-faced bouncer appears and announces in clarion tones: "Now, youse fellers wot's got de price get to yer holes, and youse fellers wot got ter carry the banner, carry!"

Many tramps, however, scorn lodging-houses except on the coldest nights. They manage to live somehow, no matter how cold the weather may be, though how they do it is a mystery. They often drag considerable clothing into the nests they inhabit under sidewalks and in the basements of deserted buildings, and on cold nights, after putting on all the clothes they have, they build small fires and some one sits up and tends the fire while the others sleep.

"I'm a-goin' back ter Sheecago," said a tramp who sat by the side of the track at Oak Park, where the freight crew had put him off. "As de schoolboys uster say: 'De cole wind does blo' an' we shall hev snow, an' wot will de hobo do then, poor thing? Why, he'll sit in ther s'loon an' keep hissil' warm an' hide his head in de free lunch, poor thing.' Ain't it de truth. Dat's right. We uster alwuz go down to Orleans wen it came cold, but dere's so many goes down dat way dat it's poor pickin'. It ain't so hard ter get along in Sheecago in de winter time. De colder it is de quicker somebody'll say ter us: 'Poor man, wat a shame, an' it's cold ernuff ter freeze de tail offen er iron monkey.' Den dey coughs up er dime. In summer time dey wud jest say: 'You big hulkin' rascal, w'y don' you go ter wuk?' an' dey gives us de chilly mit. Sure, in de summer time, de chilly mit. Ain't it funny? An' in winter time dey give us de warm smile. Sure, the warm smile. Den we kin alwuz rustle up a few han'outs on de col'est day. It's dead ezy to pick up coal off de railroad tracks, an' we alluz fiu' some good place ter crawl into an' build a fire. It's me to Sheecago fer de winter."

Words of Consolation.

"Yes, father," said young Mr. Pompuss, who had been nominated for congress, "it is too bad that your ancestors will never be as proud of you as mine are of me."—Baltimore American.

RUDE, BUT CONVINCING.

Peter Bennett's Pleading Was Somewhat Raw But It Worked Upon the Jury.

Burnham's "Leading in Law" gives an amusing account of the trial of a case wherein a doctor sued to recover his fee. The case was tried in Georgia many years ago. Robert Toombs appeared for the plaintiff and Alexander H. Stephens for the defendant. When the evidence had closed Mr. Stephens told his client, the defendant, that the plaintiff had made out his case, and, as there was no offset, it was useless to proceed further, and the best thing the defendant could do was to pay the doctor's claim. The defendant, who was named Peter Bennett, scorned this advice and indignantly replied that he had hired Mr. Stephens to speak for him, and he must say something. Mr. Stephens answered that there was nothing to say; that if Peter thought he could say anything he might address the jury himself, whereupon Peter delivered himself as follows: "Gentlemen of the jury, you and me is plain farmers, and if we don't stick together these 'ere lawyers and doctors will jis skin and bury us. This 'ere doctor was a new doctor and I went fur him to come and doctor my wife's sore leg. He come and he put some salve truck to it and some rags, but never done it a bit er good. I don't believe he is no doctor nohow. There is doctors as is doctors, but this 'ere man don't yearn his money, and if you send fur him as Miss Sal Atkins did fur a nigger boy as was wuth $1,000, he jis kills him and wants pay for it!"

"I don't!" thundered the doctor.

"Did yer cure that nigger?" asked Peter. The doctor was silent and Peter proceeded:

"As I was sayin', gintilmin, we farmers, when we sells our cotton, has got ter giv vally for the money we asks, and doctors ain't none too good to be put to the same rule. And I don't believe this 'ere man is no doctor nohow."

"Look at my diploma if you think I'm no doctor," again interposed the plaintiff.

"His 'di-piplo-mu.' Gintilmin, that is a big word fur a printed sheepskin. It don't make no doctor uv the sheep as fust wore it, nor uv the man whut now totes it. . . . Ask his patients if he's a doctor, gintilmin. But how kin yer? Where is Miss Beaseley's man Sam? Miss Peak's woman Sarah was tended by him and her funeral was ap'inted and he had the corpse ready. Where is that likely Bill, as belonged to Mr. Mitchell? Where is that baby gal of Harry Stevens'? She has gone whur doctors cease from troublin' and the infants is at rest.

"Gintilmin, he has et chicken enough at my house to pay fur his salve, and I furnished the rags, and I don't s'pose he charged fur makin' her wuss."

The defendant proceeded along this line at some length, and, despite Mr. Toomb's logical statement of the case in reply, Peter Bennett won.

PUSSY AND DISEASE.

Cats as Transmitters of Dangerous Maladies Are Now Assuredly Known.

Domestic animals are susceptible to not a few of the diseases that afflict humanity. Influenza, whooping cough, diphtheria, fevers, skin diseases and tuberculosis are among the most common, says a writer in Good Health. Animals take these diseases from man and transmit them to one another, and back again to man. Sometimes an epidemic will rage through a whole neighborhood of cats. Pussy is usually exempt from all quarantine laws and visits promiscuously the sick and the well, carrying in her fur coat germs of disease warm from the afflicted one right into the embrace of some fondling toddler. I know a little girl who was isolated from the company of her playmates. One little companion, pitying her loneliness, sent in her pussy to amuse and comfort the sick one. The little one recovered, and after a few days the kitten was returned to its owner. Ere long it developed symptoms of sickness, and instead of being isolated was fondled by its healthy mistress, to whom it gave the identical disease which proved fatal to the child.

Diphtheria becomes very fatal when an animal intervenes as the transmitter of the disease from one child to another. A case comes to mind where a little pug dog carried this dread malady of childhood from one to all the other members of a family. The first sufferer recovered, but the dog and the other children died.

Animals as playmates teach children valuable lessons in care and tenderness for others; but parents should watch the animals with which their children so closely associate, in order to detect symptoms of sickness, and then at once isolate them until they are well. For the pets' sake, keep them away from the sick-room, and for the children's sake keep the pets strictly isolated when they are ill.

It is dangerous, to say the least, to permit cats or dogs to feed from the same dishes that we ourselves use, or to permit them too free access to our tables at mealtime. Give the house pets a place where they only must be fed, and provide them with their own dishes, which, by the way, should be washed separately from all others.

Keep cats and dogs under close surveillance, lest they roam where sickness is. If a pet is worth keeping, it is worth providing with shelter and comfort at night in a clean box.

ANXIETY OVER A TOMCAT.

A Mystery Which Was Explained by a Wall Street Man.

It was in a Broadway pharmacy. A reporter was waiting with others when the druggist stepped to the telephone and, after getting the number he called for, said:

"What is that tomcat doing?"

He listened with apparent excitement and added:

"How is spinach?"

After holding the receiver to his ear for a few moments he rang off and started to attend to his customers. He seemed nervous, however, and finally excused himself in the midst of filling an order and called up the same number on the telephone again.

"Sell my tomcat at the market," he said as soon as he had some one at the other end.

Then he returned to his customer with apparent ease of mind. The reporter wondered what the druggist meant by this strange conversation until it was explained by a Wall street speculator. "Tomcat," it seems, is a pet name among brokers for Tennessee Coal and Iron stock. "Spinach" is the familiar name for Southern Pacific. The druggist had evidently bought "tomcat" low, and his excitement was caused by his eagerness to "take profits."

These are not the only stocks that have pet names in "the street." People's Gas of Chicago is known as "Post-office," and Brooklyn Rapid Transit is known among many as "Little Manhattan." The names are not the same in all brokers' offices. The jargon enables customers to give orders over the telephone to their brokers with a certain amount of secrecy. The practice is as old as "the market."—New York Mail and Express.

MISPLACED SWEETNESS.

Mamma Suffered on Account of Her Son's Lovemaking.

She was pouring at a tea that afternoon, and she looked unusually bewitching. He was sitting at her left in a bower of palms that almost concealed him. He was holding one of her hands under cover of the tablecloth, while she tried to pour with the other.

She did not look at him as he talked, but he knew by her color and the little quiver of the hand he was holding that she heard everything he said.

"Dearest," he murmured as she sent one cup off without a spoon and another filled only with whipped cream, "dearest, if you don't mind my saying all this to you, just drop a spoon. Couldn't you manage it?"

A clatter of silver and more color in the girl's face as, in stooping to pick up the spoon, he kissed her hand. Spurred by this success, he went on, "Dearest, if—if you return it—that is, if you love me, you know—just put three lumps of sugar into the next cup you pour—'y-e-s'—or, if you don't, two, to spell 'no.'"

One, two, three! The tiny cup was almost full, but in her haste to hide her confession she covered the three lumps hastily with chocolate and cream and sent them off.

He asked his mother, as they drove home that night, if she had enjoyed herself.

"Ugh! No!" was her disgusted reply. "Such horrible stuff to drink as they gave one! Why, my cup was half full of sugar!"—M. S. Holbrook in Smart Set.

"Something-In-It"-ism.

Did you ever notice how many persons there are in the world who can be induced to admit there "is something in it?" Doesn't make any difference what it is. The most of the folks will sputter disbelief for awhile and then when some sudden recollection strikes them or you get some argument in under the solar plexus they will grudgingly admit that there's something queer about it or something we don't understand or generally "something in it."

The members for the society of psychical research, the spiritualist doctor, the medium, the Christian Scientist and some of the rest of the folks will explain to you just what "is in it" according as they practice the cult. For the rest of us the vague notion that there is something somewhere somehow, that we do not understand, must needs suffice.—Lewiston Journal.

That Tired Feeling.

"There's no doubt about it," says a prominent vegetarian, "that for endurance, for hard work, vegetarianism is the only thing. Do you know why? It is because in vegetables you eat no tiredness. In meat or fish or poultry you eat a great deal of tiredness, and that is why the meat eater after a hearty meal feels lazy and heavy and disinclined to work. He has absorbed with his meat a great quantity of uric acid, and the definition of uric acid has been given by an eminent scientist as the 'essence of tiredness.' He who eats only vegetables is never tired after a meal—never."

Toil.

If you want knowledge, you must toil for it; if food, you must toil for it, and if pleasure you must toil for it. Toil is the law. Pleasure comes through toil and not by self indulgence and indolence. When a man gets to love work, his life is a happy one.

VOLUME 24. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, JANUARY 10, 1901. NUMBER 44.

A GREAT CORN STATE.

Many Large Yields of Excellent Quality—Prizes Won at an Exposition.

A recent inquiry addressed to the Baltimore Sun by a school teacher in Indiana, asking about the yield of corn in Maryland, recalls the corn-growing competition which took place in Washington county in 1882. Mr. B. F. Newcomer, of Baltimore, offered that year, for the greatest yield of corn on one-fourth of an acre raised by boys under 18 years of age, five prizes, the first of $100, the second of $50, third of $25, the fourth of $15 and the fifth of $10. The prize money was in gold, and Mr. Newcomer sent it to Mr. Humrichouse, who was then president of the Agricultural Society ot Washington county. Governor Hamilton was selected to present the prizes to the successful competitors.

The competition excited great interest, not only among the twenty-six contestants and their friends, but among farmers, without exception, and the result shows what may be accomplished by careful cultivation. The winners were: John C. Harp, first premium, 47 bushels and 28 lbs., or at the rate of 188½ bushels per acre; Benjamin F. Emmerson, second, 41 bushels and 57 pounds, or 167 bushels to the acre; Joseph W. Harp, third, 37 bushels and 16½ pounds, or 149 bushels to the acre; William Cushen, fourth, 34 bushels and 68 pounds, or 139½ bushels to the acre: Frank E. Beeler, fifth, 34 bushels and 27½ lbs., or 137½ bushels to the acre.

The land on which the first prize crop was raised was heavy clay limestone. The corn was yellow, and planted April 17. On the land were used three one-horse loads of barnyard manure, three of hog manure and two bushels of wood ashes. Three loads of manure were plowed under, three on top and the ashes were sprinkled on the rows. Two kernels were planted in a hill, and the hills were three feet apart, and three hoeings were given. The tallest stocks measured 16 feet, and the general average was 14 feet. The crop was harvested October 5.

Master Emmerson's crop (second prize) was grown on sandy loam soil, was the variety then known as Chester Mammoth, two kernels in each hill, distance apart, 2 by 1 foot. He gave four hoeings, and used one ton of land plaster as top dressing. The corn was planted April 14. Six two-horse loans of barnyard manure were put on the land and plowed under. The crop was harvested October 4.

Joseph W. Harp's third-prize crop was raised on clay loam land planted May 4, same variety of corn as Emmerson's; land had 14 cartloads barnyard manure and two sacks Lister, which was broadcasted before plowing; one stalk to the hill, 3 feet 8 inches by 10 inches apart; harvested October 9.

William Cushen, fourth-prize crop, was on clay loam soil, planted March 13 and 14; Mammoth. He used 10 cartloads of hog manure, and two sacks bone; top dressed April 1 and 15; one stalk in each hill, 1 by 3 feet apart, three hoeings; harvested October 9.

Frank E. Beeler's crop was raised on dark sandy loam soil, Mammoth, planted May 2; three four-horse loads barnyard manure spread on April 20, one stalk in hill, 3 by 1 feet, three hoeings; harvested October 12.

The manure used by John C. Harp was valued at $3; Emmerson's the same; Jos. W. Harp, $3.50; William Cushen, $3.25; and Frank E. Beeler, $4. The record does not give the number of days the crop of John C. Harp was worked. Emmerson's was worked 8 days in all; Jos. W. Harp, 3½ days; William Cushen, 2½ days, and Master Beeler, three days.

The rules which governed the competition required the contestants to be boys of Washington county under 18 years of age. Land to be measured by persons appointed by the directors of the Agricultural Society. Contestants were required to do all the work of raising the corn without any assistance. Any amount of or kind of fertilizers could be used; no stipulation as to the number times crop might be hoed. The corn had to be measured under the direction of the directors of the Agricultural Society. At the end of the season each contestant was required to make and sign a full report, giving shape, description and the location of land, when plowed, when and how manured, when planted, when and how many times hoed, when stocks were topped, if at all, when harvested, and how much raised, and as near as could be estimated the value of the manure and number of days' labor spent upon the crop, excluding the husking. The awards were made by the directors of the Agricultural Society. The corn was estimated as a bushel of ears at 75 pounds.

It is not, perhaps, generally known that Maryland corn was awarded first paize at the World's Fair at Chicago, and also at the recent Exposition at Paris. Maryland corn is not surpassed in quality by that of any State, and the yield per acre can easily be made to equal that of any State in the Union, as is shown by the results of the competition induced by Mr. Newcomer's offer.

CLALLAM, WASH., Dec. 31, 1900.

To the Editor of The Republican.

DEAR SIR:—After having spent three months in the Wild West I will try to write a few items for your valuable paper.

We arrived in Seattle on the Great Northern flyer at 9 p. m. Although it was Sunday evening the saloons were open and a play was in progress at the theatre. After staying in the city three hours we went on board the steamer Alice Gertrude and took passage for Clallam, which is situated on the Strait of Juan de Tuca at about twenty-five miles from Cape Flattery and Vancouver Island about thirteen miles distant.

The second day after my arrival here I had the good fortune to kill a large buck. The way they hunt deer here they find where the deer cross a stream, then some one stands at the crossing and another goes on a ridge or feeding ground with the dogs and runs the deer in the water for the one standing there to shoot. That is the only way they hunt deer, as the forests are so dense they cannot get to see them any other way. Then occasionally one gets to kill a seal as there are a great many here, not the fur seal but the hair seal, and almost any time one can catch codfish that will weigh from ten to twenty pounds. I caught one a few days ago that was three feet long and weighed seventeen pounds.

It is exciting to see the Siwash Indians killing a whale. They have a harpoon with a seal skin filled with air attached to it, then when a canoe gets close enough they stick a harpoon in the whale and he will sound; as soon as he comes to the surface they will stick another harpoon in it with another seal skin attached and this canoe will fasten on to the first one behind and so on till the whale is towing sometimes eight or ten canoes and he will have so many air tight skins he cannot sound and he is then at the tender mercies of the Indians. They are natural born fishermen, as one Siwash will often make thirty dollars in a single day trolling for salmon with a hand line, and when they go fishing for halibut; they often return with a ton and a-half of fish, about six hours' work. As a race the Siwash are a short, square-built people, somewhat resembling the Chinese or Japs, as indeed they are supposed to be descended from that race of people, as there have been some Chinese coins two thousand years old found on the Pacific Coast. They speak two kinds of languages—the Siwash and Chinook—the latter a kind of jargon invented by the white man for trading purposes.

POLITICAL NEWS.

Recruits for the Senatorship Fight Now Appear.

In discussing the senatorial contests last Sunday the Baltimore American said:

The talk is going around among politicians these days, Republican senatorial candidates are springing up thick and fast. There is every indication, at this early date, that the contest in the matter of Senator Wellington's successor will obscure everything else in local politics during the first year of the new century, and the ball has already started rolling. It is generally conceded that what was said in these columns two weeks ago, concerning the double game Congressman Mudd is preparing to play, is correct. Mr. Mudd has not denied it, and so accurate was it that it is known to have caused more than a little worry in certain quarters where his candidacy is not viewed with especial favor. But it has had the effect of concentrating public attention among the politicians on this matter.

That Mudd has the long end of the string at this time is acknowledged by all, and one of the most prominent Republicans of the state—a man who has never aided or abetted Mr. Mudd's aspirations—remarked a day or so after the publication of that story:

"The man who undertakes to belittle Mudd's influence, should the Republicans control the next Legislature, will make a serious mistake. The Fifth district congressman is going to be a big factor in the fight in the matter of Senator Wellington's successor."

That seems to be the opinion among the local workers, and it is believed that certain influences are at work to bring out a number of candidates in order to prevent Mudd from making a series of effective combinations. In the last two weeks there have been mentioned as probable candidates for senatorial honors, Congressman Geo. A. Pearre, of the Sixth congressional district, who, it is admitted, can control the delegations from Allegany and Garrett counties, should he desire to enter the race; Milton G. Urner, of Frederick county, who will name the legislative ticket in that county and dictate the casting of the county's vote should the Republicans carry it.

From the Eastern Shore, Philips Lee Goldsborough, state chairman, will, it is believed, enter the fight aggressively. He has a strong following in that section, but the opinion prevails that he will be unable to secure the backing of the whole Eastern Shore delegation, since it is believed that others, probably ex-Congressman Isaac A. Barber, ex-State Senator A. Lincoln Dryden and ex-State Senator Charles T. Westcott will enter the race and split up the contingent from across the bay. In 1896, Mr. Goldsborough was the leading candidate against Senator Wellington. He made his own fight then, and it seems to be generally accepted that he will have to make it the same way again, for no one expects Senator McComas to enter the lists in Mr. Goldsborough's behalf, unless it should become necessary in order to defeat Congressman Mudd.

EDUCATIONAL MATTERS.

Mr. M. E. Frazee, Who is Attending School in Ohio, Contributes to the Educational Column.

To the Editor of The Republican.

Not long since I noticed that THE REPUBLICAN was willing to give one column of its valuable paper to educational affairs for the benefit of the public schools, which I consider an excellent idea. It shows the intense interest that the editor is taking in the schools of our county. He has done his part and now it remains for the citizens and teachers to do theirs.

Almost without exception the best thought of civilization accepts the theory that school education for the young should be a public undertaking, conducted and supported by the community at large. This policy has easily justified itself to the reason. Childhood is ignorant and helpless. It does not know what influences to admit and what to avoid. If not given, in his youth, the benefit of the experience and learning that have preceded him man would consume the richest portion of his life in getting wisdom by the hard road of guesswork, experimentation and mistakes. He would exhaust his energies and capacity for new achievements in battling with crude difficulties that the race has long since overcome and gone on to the solution of the higher and more finely drawn questions of intellectual and ethical life and of social organization. So important is it, indeed, that every man and woman should be started in life with this preliminary equipment that the matter must not be left to the choice of the children themselves, nor even to the will of some of the parents, but some universal system must be provided which shall not only put educational opportunities within the reach of all, but shall guarantee to these future men and women the sound quality and usefulness of the instruction given them. Private enterprise can neither furnish this universal opportunity nor guarantee and enforce this necessary standard of educational work. The community must do it collectively and do it, if necessary, even against the will of the minority; this for the sake of social progress, and hence ultimately of the survival of civilization.

The providing of free public education has had the hearty endorsement of almost every school of political and social philosophers. In the United States the public school system has always been of the most popular features of our institutions. It even has become the center of a great deal of genuine sentiment and is generally described as one of the foundation stones of the republic. Now this may logically be said to be true of a county.

It is a noticeable fact that but very little protest against the increasing expense of providing education has arisen anywhere nor has the growing importance of the public school system in our national life been hailed with anything but satisfaction by political economists and students of social institutions.

Now, we need more school in Garrett county and I shall suggest a few ways by which we may secure money to keep open the schools seven months, which would be about as long as the majority of the children could remain in school, especially in the country. First, by having a poll tax. Many of the states have adopted this for the benefit of their schools; and I am sure no loyal citizen of Garrett would object to this if it be for the schooling of his children, brothers or sisters. Second, by having a dog tax. This I believe to be a good thing for the county. Not long since a person told me that he knew of a man in the county who owned fourteen dogs, and a farmer of that district told me that he had lost over $1000 worth of sheep by dogs. Third, by raising the taxes a few mills on the dollar. I am certain the majority of the citizens of the county will be willing to do that, providing it be to help the schools. We sometimes think we are paying heavy taxes, but if we compare the taxes of our adjoining counties we find that they pay from 15 to 25 mills on the dollar, while we pay not quite 10 mills on the dollar, and the assessed valuation of property is no higher in our county than in these counties.

The past has its lessons, the present has its duties and the future has its hopes. So with the financial development in our schools. The United States appropriated over $200,000,000 last year for public schools, or an average of about $3 per capita—almost all of this being raised by public taxation, State and local, from which we see that we have not been getting our share by about one-half.

Fellow-citizens and teachers of Garrett county, think this matter over for it is a serious one. Other states are passing on in the educational affairs, yea, other counties of our own State. Shall we stand still and be satisfied with five months of school? I should think not in this age of progress, the beginning of the 20th century.

MAYOR HAYES DEFIANT.

Throws Down the Gauntlet to Democratic Leaders.—Says He Is Not In Favor of Negro Disfranchisement.

Leading Democratic politicians are much chagrined at the attitude of Mayor Hayes in coming out flat-footed against an extra session of the Legislature to disfranchise the illiterate negro voter. The Mayor is recognized as being in the political confidence of State Senator Olin Bryan, and the latter's vote is absolutely essential to the Democrats in the Senate to secure a constitutional majority.

Under the circumstances there is great trepidation among the leaders that the scheme of disfranchising the ignorant negro vote and thereby making the State safely Democratic is virtually knocked in the head.

Mayor Hayes said this afternoon: "I am opposed to an extra session of the Legislature, and will fight any such proposition." The Mayor bases his antagonism to the project for several reasons. He says to deprive any set of men, white or black, of their Constitutional right to vote is a bad step backward. In Maryland the negro is not a menace to the lives of the whites, as in South Carolina.

He believes it would be undemocratic to deprive anybody of his vote, and that it would be in violation of all the teachings of the leaders of the Democratic party and the fathers of the Republic. While it may be true that the ignorant voter can be bought the Mayor says that he constitutes an effective check upon many of the unfortunate tendencies of the times. He does not consider it advisable to place the government in the hands of any one class, and says the more widespread the suffrage the more safeguards there are about the rights of the people as a whole.

"'Tom' Hayes has deliberately placed himself outside the breastworks," declared a Democratic politician this morning. "He has made other bad breaks, from a party standpoint, but this time he goes the entire route and throws down the gauntlet good and hard to every Democratic leader in the State. He promises to block the only chance we had to push through the desired legislation. Without Senator Bryan the necessary 14 votes in the Senate cannot be gotten. It is true there are 15 Democratic names on the Senate roll, but Senator Claggett is unable to attend, he being absent throughout the last session and is now in no better condition.

"The result in both city and State at the Presidential election affords no comfort to the Democrats, and our only opportunity to regain our control is by legislation disfranchising the illiterate vote, both white and black. Now, if 'Tom' Hayes was a good party man he would readily recognize the exigencies of the situation and throw whatever influence he posseses with the interests of his party. Unfortunately for the success of the plans laid out, he is just able to checkmate everything through his supposed influence with Senator Bryan. The latter is conscientious and honest, but he is apt to see things through the Hayes eyeglasses that he cannot be depended on in this emergency.

"It would be folly to go down to Annapolis to an extra session without a positive knowledge that the scheme would go through without a hitch. From all reports, Governor Smith could be induced to call the extra session provided the fences were all fixed. He cannot be blamed for holding off as he has done until sure of his ground. Mayor Hayes has, by this action, fashioned another and shorter nail for his political coffin."

State Senator Olin Bryan, who is also Mayor Hayes' appointee as First Assistant City Solicitor, opposed the project of disfranchising the illiterate negro vote last winter when it was being agitated at Annapolis. He was asked recently whether he stood now as he did last year on this question, and he replied that he did not. He said he was prepared to listen to party counsels on all party matters, but would not commit himself either for or against the disfranchisement proposition.

CONTRA PORRAZO

By Philip Firmin.

THE winter climate of California is very delightful, especially at the great Hotel Balboa, but even there clouds are not unknown and storms occur at times. Similarly the relationship between Col. Talbot and his daughter Josephine was said by their sentimental friends, to be a beautiful one—for they loved each other devotedly, and were seldom separated—nevertheless, it had its periods of disturbance, when they failed to agree, and when each spoke freely according to the family custom.

The colonel was a man of large means, whose home was in an eastern city. He had taken a suite of rooms in the Balboa for the winter, for a party which consisted of himself, his daughter, aged 23, and his sister, a matron of about his own age. There was also a maid.

The season was about half-over when the trouble between the colonel and Miss Josephine began. The storm center at the outset was a certain Harry Grandin. Some time later a second area of disturbance was created around a widow, a Mrs. Bronson, but this was declared by the colonel not to be a genuine casus belli, but merely a counter-irritant—and an attempt to get up a side-issue.

"It seems very strange," said Josephine, "that the person I love best in all the world, my own father, is the only one that thinks I am a perfect fright."

"I don't think anything of the kind!" cried the colonel, indignantly. "You are an exceptionally handsome woman, as your mother was before you, and I know it, as well as—as you do." He finished with a grin.

"Then why do you always assume that every man that pays me the slightest attention does so merely because of your money?" She beamed on him, as one does who has scored.

"I don't assume it of everyone—" began the colonel.

"That is not rich and bald and stupid."

"My dear," said the colonel, solemnly, "there are some things in this world that your old dad knows a little more about than you do, and money is one of them. There are two parts to getting rich. One is to make money, and the other is to hold on to it. The first of these is easy enough, but the second is deadly hard. Who was the Englishman who said that whenever he woke up in the morning in the city of Paris and suddenly remembered that the place contained, according to police statistics, over 60,000 people who would rob him if they got a chance, it threw him into a blue funk? Now I have some money, I admit; there is enough to allow us to take life easy, and to do pretty much as we please, within reason. I have put it in the best possible shape to leave to you when I pass out. But how long do you think it will last, if some rascally young spendthrift should have a chance at it, as your husband? So I would rather suspect 99 innocent ones than have you caught on the hundredth one who would play the mischief with your happiness."

"You must be pretty well through with the 99," said Josephine.

"Like enough," said her father. "In that case our young friend Grandin must be the hundredth that is specially to be looked out for."

"Now to go back to the point from which this talk started," said Josephine, "I believe I told you that there was to be a fishing party to-morrow, and that Mr. Grandin asked Aunt Harriet and me to go. What do you think?"

"Do just as you please about it," said the colonel. "You can't lure me into forbidding things, so as to make in interesting. I am merely giving you a little tip, Dodie, my dear, because I love you."

Miss Josephine flung herself over the arm of the colonel's chair, and put her arms about his neck. "Oh, dad, I love you, too. Sometimes I almost wish that there wasn't any money for us to get all mixed up about."

"Stick to that 'almost,' Dodie."

"And, say, dad, you don't mind my giving you a tip, do you?"

The colonel looked a little uncomfortable.

"It's about the widow, you know."

"Whom do you mean?" he asked, with dignity; "Mrs. Bronson?"

"Who else? You are not interested in more than one widow, are you? I heard the other day that her first was a butcher. Think of it—the poor little lamb!"

"He was a Kansas City meat man," said the colonel, indignantly; "and I should think you and your aunt might find something better to spend your time in than mere gossip."

Whenever the conversation shifted to the subject of the widow, Col. Talbot felt himself at a great disadvantage, as is always the case with simple innocence, when it is called upon to face adroit insinuation and the suspicion that lurks in a tone rather than in the spoken words. It is true that he admired Mrs. Bronson, for she was pretty, and dressed in modest, becoming style, and she was a bright and entertaining talker. Yes, he must admit that he liked her best of all the women at the Balboa; the others, who were of suitable age for his companionship, were, too dull, or were taken up with daughters, or devoted to complaining husbands. Her father had been a Loyal Legion man, as he was, and she could remember something of the war—just enough for him to fix her age at 15 years less than his own—and this gave one fruitful topic of conversation. She admired Scott and Dickens, and disdained the "new stuff," as he did. Longfellow was her favorite poet—and his. Her tastes and interests were simple and domestic, yet she was greatly diverted by the colonel's experiences in business and politics. The other women were civil to her, but a little distant. This may have been due to the suspicious hints let fall by Josephine and her aunt, or it may have arisen simply from the fact that she was a widow. All single women and most married ones think that the widow should take her place on the funeral pyre, beside the body of the husband, after the Indian fashion.

When the fishing party had departed, the next morning, the colonel betook himself to the bowling-alley, whither none but a few old enthusiasts ever came. At one end of the long room, in a little alcove, there was a window that looked out over the ocean. The widow was fond of this quiet, secluded spot, and on days when Josephine and her aunt were away, the colonel usually found her there. She had a soft crepe shawl over her rounded shoulders, and she was busy over a beaded purse.

She scarcely looked up from her work as he approached and seated himself by her side. "Are you going to play?" she asked; and he replied, according to the regular formula: "Presently. May I sit here?"

"Certainly." She looked innocently beyond him, toward the alley. "Did your daughter come down with you?" Miss Josephine never played.

"She has gone fishing with her aunt and the rest of them. Why didn't you go too?"

As a matter of fact the widow had not been asked. "I do not care for fishing," she said, and as she did so she baited her hook with a sweet smile and threw it out toward him. The colonel's old heart gave a youthful jump, and his hand trembled a little, as he readjusted his eyeglasses.

"I took pains to find out whether you were to be of the party," said he; "and when I found you were not going, I decided that I did not care for fishing, myself."

It is about half a mile from the boat landing to the entrance of the Balboa. As the fishing party walked this distance one small detachment, consisting of Miss Josephine and Mr. Grandin, fell so far behind and moved so slowly that even the sympathetic Aunt Harriet glared fiercely at them as they came upon the steps.

Mr. Grandin was another who did not care much for fishing. He was saying: "People were altogether too thick in that beastly little boat. I have not had a word alone with you all day."

"Anything to say?"

"Only the same thing."

"You may say it just once."

"I love you."

"Walk faster: I can see my father looking at us from the corner of the piazza."

"And the widow is with him—your step-mamma that is to be."

"Don't you dare to say it. If I thought so, I would marry the first man that asked me."

"I will be the first."

Next morning a letter and a newspaper lay beside the colonel's plate when he came down to breakfast a little in advance of his daughter and sister. He recognized the same address on both—that of his attorney in the eastern city where he resided—and he broke the seal of the letter with some eagerness:

"My Dear Colonel: I got the stuff printed in the Times, just as you asked, though they would not use your name. It points to you plainly enough, however. I don't understand the game, but you probably know what you are doing. Is there a hen on in the Blue Elephant? Should I buy or sell? Sounds funny to read that the failure of the mine will affect your fortunes, remembering, as I do, how cleverly you sneaked out of it unscathed a year ago.

"As you requested, I have started an inquiry about the young man Grandin, and will be ready to report on him in a few days. What is the matter? Another moth at Josephin.'s flame? My dear fellow, I have told you a thousand times that you are too supicious.

"Yours, A. G. W."

Then the colonel unfolded the newspaper and, finding the marked passage, read as follows:

"Politics Is Money.—It is rumored that the true reason for the sudden withdrawal of a well-known citizen from the senatorial race, and his departure for California, was not at all his friendship for the governor, as was alleged at the time, but the disastrous failure of an enterprise in which he was financially involved to a very considerable extent. When the Blue Elephant went to pieces, the event was not supposed to have any political significance, but its largest owner was known to be a certain colonel who is now suddenly out of politics. It costs money to be a senator in this state, and the pastime is well enough for millionaires. But a fortune that is reduced to bare bones, and which perhaps scarcely exists at all, will not stand such a strain."

The colonel smiled grimly as he read the article, and several times during the course of the breakfast, which he ate by himself, without waiting for the ladies, he chuckled, as though something on his mind was affording him great amusement.

When Miss Josephine and her aunt came into the room he drew a long face and, handing his daughter the paper with the marked portion exposed, he said: "It is out at last. Excuse me, but I must go over to the city to be gone all day. Don't worry, my daughter; there is enough for us to live on, in a way." Then he hurried out of the room.

"Oh," said Josephine, "it was only yesterday that I said to father that I almost wished he would lose all his money."

"How could you wish such a wicked thing," cried her aunt, reproachfully. "Now you see what has happened."

They were just beginning to read the article through for the third time when Josephine looked up and said: "Here comes Mr. Grandin."

"Hide it," said her aunt.

"Indeed I shall not. I intend that he shall see it first of all."

"Good morning, Mrs. Blake; good morning, Miss Talbot. May I sit here? I did not see you ladies anywhere last evening."

"We played 'porrazo' in our rooms with the colonel and Mr. Edmunds. Do you play 'porrazo,' Mr. Grandin?"

"I tried it once, Mrs. Blake, but I do not approve of a game where you lay down a card and say 'porrazo,' with great triumph, only to have the next person to you lay down another card and say 'contra porrazo,' and take it all away from you. Where is the colonel, by the way?"

"He has gone to the city for the day."

"There is something here that I wish you to read, Mr. Grandin," said Josephine, handing him the paper.

The young man read the article, and brought his lips together in a bunch.

"This refers to Col. Talbot, I take it," said he.

Josephine nodded.

"And it means that he has lost his money?"

Josephine nodded again, and her aunt looked sadly into her coffee cup.

"Does this involve you in any way, Mrs. Blake?"

"Not at all."

Mr. Grandin smiled cheerfully.

"I suppose I ought to be decently sympathetic," said he, "but it is desperately hard work. This affects no one, it appears, but Col. Talbot, and my regard for him is entirely by proxy. I am ready to take his loving daughter's word for it that he is a delightful character, but he has never shown that side of himself to me."

"But it affects me," cried Josephine. "Don't you see that?"

"Not a bit of it," said Mr. Grandin. "I am going to take care of you, and I have a great plenty." Mrs. Blake looked up in surprise, and he addressed himself to her. "This is a matter which I would have taken up with Col. Talbot, if he had ever given me a chance, but his manner toward me during the last week or so has been such as to make it impossible for me to address him on any subject. I don't blame him. I am sure that if I had such a precious object to guard, I should be a Cerberus, too."

He took a card from his pocket and wrote some names upon it. "Here is a bank," said he, "and a firm of attorneys, and a well-known business house, all of them located in the city where I live. Now if the colonel wishes to make inquiry of any of these he will find out, I think, all that he needs to know about me as a son-in-law."

Mrs. Blake picked the card up doubtfully and placed it in the bag that hung at her side. She stood a good deal in awe of her brother.

When the young people were alone a few minutes later, Josephine said: "I heard where you were last evening."

Grandin shook his head sadly. "What a small place a big hotel is," he said.

"Are you anxious to make yourself still more unpopular with my father?"

"I wanted to see what sort of a step-mother-in-law I was likely to have—that was all."

"What do you think of her?"

"I agree with you. She won't do at all. Something must be—by Jove! Where is that paper? Let me have it for awhile, will you? I have an idea."

He took the paper and went off in search of the widow, whom he presently found sitting alone. She liked attentions from young men, and Grandin was a delightful talker.

A second letter from "A. G. W.," which arrived a day or two later, conveyed to the colonel some information about Mr. Grandin that caused him to open wide his eyes and whistle softly to himself. The colonel was not exactly a worshiper of wealth, but he found it easy to respect a man who was worth several times as much money as he was, and he started out immediately to apologize, and make amends. In his search he came upon the widow, bonneted and cloaked and accompanied by her maid.

"Good-by," she cried, airily; "I am off."

"Off!" exclaimed the colonel, in astonishment. He had seen but little of her during the last few days, but had supposed that was due to accident.

"Yes, to the Pizarro and then back east," she said. "Thank you and your dear daughter and sister for being so kind to me." Her manner was patronizing, not to say contemptuous, and the colonel, who had grown accustomed to her soft, confiding ways, was too astounded to do anything except stare at her as she vanished down the corridor.

Mr. Grandin would listen to no apologies or explanations, but grasped the colonel's hand and shook it warmly. Then they had a brandy and soda together.

"That newspaper story," said the colonel, "was a fake. I did not lose anything in the Blue Elephant."

"You didn't?" cried Mr. Grandin; and he laughed.

"No," said the colonel; and he explained how and why he had secured its publication. At this Mr. Grandin laughed a good deal more.

"You see," said the colonel, "I have always had a horror of a marriage in my family with any kind of a mercenary element in it. If such a marriage could be avoided by a little ruse like that, I thought I would be justified in resorting to it. Don't you agree with me?"

Mr. Grandin laughed again, but he said that he entirely agreed with the colonel. He had heard of the widow's departure, a little while before, and he knew that that danger was passed. He reserved his part of the confession, however, until some other occasion when it might be needed.

REAL RAILWAY KING

Vast Power Exerted by J. Pierpont Morgan, of New York.

Has at His Command a Greater Army in Point of Numbers Than That Controlled by President McKinley.

By his action in uniting in the joint control of the Erie system three of the great railroad interests of the country, and securing for those interests, and for himself, the control of the anthracite output of the United States, J. Pierpont Morgan has made himself the greatest individual factor in railroading and transportation in the entire world.

By this action, says the Philadelphia Press, Mr. Morgan adds to a long series of brilliant achievements its crowning work. To-day he has under his direct control more men, more miles of railroad and greater interests than any man on either hemisphere. He has greater power for good or evil than the czar of Russia. He has at his command, and subject to his will, a greater army, in point of numbers, than that controlled by the president of the United States.

And throughout this splendid history of consolidation of interests and accumulation of wealth J. Pierpont Morgan has been a builder and not a destroyer. In this respect he is the antithesis of the late Jay Gould. The financial history of Jay Gould's life was filled with wrecks; that of J. Pierpont Morgan's career is dotted with monuments to his creative genius and financial skill.

The great achievements of finance of J. Pierpont Morgan are:

The Northern Pacific railroad, operating 4,956 miles, whose gross earnings for the years 1898-99 were $26,048,673, and whose total tonnage for that period was 5,816,639 tons.

The Erie railroad, operating 2,271 miles, with gross earnings for the same period of $33,752,703, with a total tonnage of 24,916,944 tons.

The Southern railroad, operating a total of owned and leased lines of 5,959

J. PIERPONT MORGAN.
(Famous the World Over as the Reorganizer of Railways.)

miles, with a balance sheet showing gross earnings for the fiscal year 1899 of $25,028,990.

The Reading, with 1,452 miles and gross earnings for last year of $23,202,588, and a total combined of general freight and coal of 25,121,343 tons carried by it.

Lehigh Valley, with a total system of 1,402 miles, and gross earnings for 1898 of $19,742,538.

Baltimore & Ohio, operating 2,046 miles in its system, with gross earnings from all lines of $28,404,922.

A glance at the map will show that the influence and power of J. Pierpont Morgan includes a territory of more than half the United States. To the above list there should be added the Great Northern railroad, which by virtue of the recent combination effected with James J. Hill has come under Pierpont Morgan's influence, just as the Baltimore & Ohio, although reorganized and financed by Speyer & Co., is in reality a child of the fertile brain and magnificent resources of this man Morgan. His word is law to more multimillionaires than that of any man that ever lived.

In personal appearance, he is of medium height, well rounded, with a well-fed appearance, rather florid complexion and prominent nose. His eyes are the feature of an expressive face, just as his large, strong hands are the feature of his body. Men who have seen him in all his varying moods say that his eyes can assume all shades expressive of his emotions, from the steel blue tint of contempt or indifference, to the blazing red of anger and the softness of emotions that are bred of something besides money getting.

J. Pierpont Morgan is an Episcopalian. He is a consistent member of that denomination and a vestryman in one of its churches. His hobbies are his yacht and his collie dogs. The greatest evidence that Mr. Morgan can give of esteem or friendship for any man is to invite him on board his yacht or send him as a present one of his famous collies.

The Krupp Iron Works.

The large steel works of Krupp, in Essen, consumed in 1899 no less than 16,000,000 cubic meters of water, which equals about the consumption of the city of Frankfort, with 230,000 inhabitants. The Essen works consumed further, 1,682,000 tons of coal and 18,800,000 cubic meters of gas.

he sorely needs. It is learned that he has actually grown gray during the last two years from the inordinate strain upon his faculties caused by the Boer troubles. Thoroughly hated by the Dutch Afrikanders in Cape Colony, and not always escaping criticism from his own countrymen, his lot has not been a pleasant one. Yet his administration has been successful in most respects, and he has managed colonial affairs in Africa in a manner which has pleased the government.

Sir Alfred Milner is a comparatively young man, considerably on the best side of 50. His success as a diplomat has been a surprise to himself and to his friends, for such a career was far from his thoughts when, in 1881, having just been graduated in law, he became a member of the staff of the Pall Mall Gazette. Mr. Goschen made the young journalist his private secretary, and an appointment as under secretary of finance in Egypt decided his career. His great capacities were soon recognized, and after a few years of service at home he was sent to South Africa in 1897 as governor of the Cape. At that time he was knighted, and in the three years which have followed he has raised himself to his present notable position of importance in the colonial affairs of Great Britain.

THE FOOTBALL RECORD.

An Itemized Account of the Fatalities and Injuries Reported During the Season.

Nine young men were killed in playing football last fall. Four of them had their spines hurt, two were thrown head first, two were hurt in fierce games for which they had not trained, one broke a blood vessel and one died of blood poisoning from a broken arm which he was trying to hide from his parents.

Eight players were badly hurt, and some of these are expected to die. Among the injuries are a broken neck, a stamped stomach, concussion of the brain, paralysis and internal injuries from being trampled on or thrown hard while running.

Twenty-two players suffered broken bones. The list includes a finger, an ankle, a knee, a cheek bone, two shoulders, three hands, four legs, five ribs and seven collar bones. The number of sprains, dislocations and bad bruises is legion.

As a result of this record, says the Little Chronicle, there is, as usual at this time of year, a good deal of talk about reforming football. The cities of Omaha and Council Bluffs threaten to stop the game and Chicago has thoughts of forbidding it in high schools. The Wisconsin legislature has been petitioned to suppress the game in that state. However, there seems no likelihood that the favorite college sport will be stopped.

Sermons by the Thousands.

It is related of Rev. Jotham Sewall, a missionary preacher of Maine, in the closing years of the last and the first half of this century, that during his long life he preached 11,389 sermons in Maine and 1,-04 in 11 other states.

A KANSAS GAS TOWN.

Where Lights and Fuel Are to Be Had at Very Small Expense.

Coffeyville, Kan., the border town that some years ago sprang into public notice by reason of the great fight with "the Dalton boys," has now become a city of 10,000 inhabitants and possesses a fuel supply that, without any joking, easily supports its claim of being, even yet, the warmest town in the west, says the Chicago Chronicle.

This, however, does not consist in buckshot cartridges and Winchester ammunition, but in the flow of some 15 gas wells, all well within the city limits. These have been opened at various times during the past few years—not for the purpose of getting gas, for the average prospector looks on a gas well as a sort of rival, but with an idea of striking oil. Owing doubtless to the prospectors' antipathy for the "natural blowers" nothing was done with them until recently.

Their owners, in fact, generally abandoned them, and about a year ago the leading citizens of the place bought them all up and formed the Coffeyville Fuel Supply company. They piped the whole town, and in consideration of a 40-year franchise from the city put in a lamp every half block, agreeing to keep them burning 24 hours every day if the city council wished.

These street lamps are about as unique as anything of their kind; they are merely four-inch iron pipes run up from the mains to a height of about ten feet. There is no pretense at burners—when it is time to light them the lamplighter comes around with a handspike and a long-range torch, proceeds to pry the valve from the main open, and then, while the gas rushes up with a roar like a whirlwind, puts his torch to the top of the pipe. There is a flash and a big pop like the touching off of a lot of loose powder, and the light is going. The flame rises to a height of two or three feet, and when the wind blows whips and flutters into long streamers; and at all times the roar of the burning sounds as loud as the blast of a Kansas norther.

It is in the private use of the gas, however, that the system here is most remarkable. There is not a gas meter in the whole place. A two-inch pipe is run from the main to the house or building in which it is to be used. The fuel company gives the user the privilege of keeping the valve open all the time if he so wishes so long as he pays his 50 cents per month.

Controlling the pressure from the mains is left to the consumer, and many devices are in use which more or less successfully accomplish this object. Besides using the gas for a cooking fuel, most householders heat their homes with it. Grates are unknown. When it is desired to heat a room the gas is turned on to its fullest capacity, and the blaze looks like the blast from a furnace.

All this, which in a better developed region would be the worst sort of waste and extravagance, is here the best economy. There is simply no other use to which the gas can be put.

NOVEL THEORY OF MURDER.

Cruel Treatment of Animals Said to Be an Index to the Criminal Instinct.

According to an ingenious statistician who has been at work on the subject ever since the assassination of King Humbert of Italy, the greatest number of murders is likely to be committed in that country in which animals are treated with the most cruelty. He claims, too, that comparatively few murders are committed in those countries in which societies for the protection of animals flourish, says a London exchange.

Out of every million inhabitants, he says, there are in England and Ireland only six murderers; in Germany, 11; in Belgium, 14; in France, 16; in Austria, 23, in Hungary, 67; in Spain, 83, and in Italy, 95.

These figures, he maintains, are just what might be expected. In no country, he says, are animals treated with more kindness than in Great Britain and with more cruelty than in Italy, and the treatment accorded to them in the other countries may fairly be gauged according to the number of murders committed in each.

At the same time this statistician, who is a German and an influential member of the Berlin Society for the Protection of Animals, admits that climate is a considerable factor in the matter.

New Chamberlain Fable.

On the Quai des Fleurs in Paris, Mr. Chamberlain saw one day a rare orchid. "How much?" asked the future minister. "Twenty pounds, monsieur; it is the only specimen in France." "Here is the money," replied Chamberlain, and, drawing the notes from his pocket, he took the flower, tore it to pieces, and trampled it under foot, saying: "I have it in my own collection, but I object to a Frenchman having a duplicate." END OF AN OLD FEUD.

The Last Participant in a Kansas Vendetta Removed by the Grim Reaper.

By the death of Charles Vaughn, 15 miles south of Cedarville, Kan., in the Osage reservation recently, the last survivor of a feud which was fought along the border with all the fierceness of a Corsican vendetta for months was wiped out. The participants were on the one hand Jim and Charles Vaughn, cowboys—who were cousins—and Tom Wilber and Dennis Amos, who ran a "joint" in Caney, Kan., in 1879 and 1880, and the feud began in this joint in August, 1880, when Tom Amos in a game of poker beat Jim Vaughn out of $70, relates the Kansas City Times.

Vaughn was by accident unarmed at the time, but left, swearing that he would return in three days and kill all the Amoses. Accordingly Vaughn returned to the ranch on which he was working in the territory, procured a brace of six-shooters and on the appointed day went back to Caney. The Amoses, barricaded in their joint and armed with three double-barreled shotguns, were waiting for him. Vaughn hitched his horse and pulling his six-shooters began firing and walking toward the Amos joint. The Amoses replied with a broadside from their shotguns and when the smoke had cleared away Vaughn lay in the street with his body full of buckshot and Tom Amos lay on the floor with his jaw shattered by a bullet. Blood poison set in and four weeks later Amos was buried. On the other hand, Vaughn, who was thought to have been mortally wounded, recovered, and in two months was able to go to work again.

Vaughn was a crack shot and the Amoses lived in constant terror of him, and after they found that he had gotten well they swore out a warrant for his arrest—which was an unusual proceeding in those days. A deputy sheriff, who was a warm friend of the jointkeepers, arrested Vaughn and put the Amoses and one of their friends on the force to guard him the night after the arrest. During the night while the deputy slept the Amoses shot and killed Vaughn. They claimed that he had tried to escape. However, three of the five shots which had pierced the dead man's body were fired after he had fallen—so the direction of the bullets' courses indicated.

The Amoses at that time did not know of the existence of Charles Vaughn—who was employed on a ranch in Texas—and, after they had killed Jim, settled down to quiet life. Wilber remained in Caney and Dennis Amos, with his young wife and child, located on a farm just east of Cedarville. A friend of Jim Vaughn in the meantime notified Charles Vaughn of the manner in which his cousin had been killed, and Charles thereupon boarded the next train and went to Caney. He remained quiet a day and by inquiry learned of the whereabouts of the Amoses. On the second day after his arrival he met Wilber Amos in a drug store, and, walking up to him, informed him that he was there for the purpose of killing him. Amos reached for his gun, but Vaughn was too quick for him and sent a 45-caliber bullet through his brain. The dead man had hardly struck the floor before Vaughn was on his horse riding at a breakneck speed toward town.

Dennis Amos was eating dinner when Vaughn reached his house, and without introducing himself the Texan opened fire and sent one bullet through Dennis' breast and another through his head. The infuriated cowboy then picked up the child and dashed its brains out against the floor. He also fired a shot at the woman, but she escaped into the bedroom, and Vaughn, thinking his pursuers were close upon him, mounted his horse and rode away. Although a posse pursued him for two days he was not overtaken and his whereabouts had never been known from that day to the day of his death. One day lately, when, after a six weeks' struggle with the fever, he found that he had to die, he told his attendants that he was Charles Vaughn and narrated the above story, which the older residents of Cedarville know to be true.

Two Parliamentary Bulls.

The session of the British parliament that recently ended was not particularly prolific of funny sayings, but there were a couple of good things unconsciously said. The first was by Mr. Field, M. P. He had made a statement at which Mr. Chamberlain shook his head a silent negative. Mr. Field turned to Mr. Chamberlain and proclaimed: "The right honorable gentleman shakes his head. I am sorry to hear it." The second was from an Irishman, Mr. Flavin, M. P. He was about to put a question to a cabinet minister when the right honorable gentleman reminded Mr. Flavin that a letter had been sent to him (Mr. F.) asking him to postpone the question until such time as the minister could obtain the information needed before an answer could be given. "Yes, sir," replied Mr. Flavin, "that is so. I have got the letter and have not had time to open it."—San Francisco Argonaut.

SIGNS OF UPHEAVAL.

Spasms That Presage the Approaching Period of Activity in Volcanoes.

Careful study of the behavior of volcanoes has enabled observers in recent years to predict with some degree of accuracy when a renewal of plutonic activity is impending. This was the case last summer, when Mount Etna for a few days attracted attention, after seven years of almost complete quiescence. The last eruption had occurred in 1892, but in the autumn of 1898 blue flames began to emerge from the mouth of the largest crater and a great deal of vapor was emitted from the lesser orifices.

It was then announced that Etna seemed to be preparing for an effusion of lava, probably on the south or southwest slopes. The expected eruption did not begin till the morning of July 19, 1899, when great volumes of smoke, with lava and sand, began to issue from the main crater, but after several days the activity subsided and Etna soon resumed its peaceful aspect. The present generation hears little of Santorin, among the Cyclades, in the Egean sea, but the volcano will again become a center of interest if the recent statement is true that Santorin is preparing for another series of the terrific explosions and outbursts of flame that have always marked its active periods.

For 30 years Santorin has been content with the continuous mild emission of gases, but according to Comtes Rendus, of the French Academy of Sciences, the volcano now exhibits much unrest and an active period is predicted. It is near the crescent western shore of Thera that Santorin has reared itself and two other lava islands above the sea. When it finally arouses itself after long periods of quiescence, no volcano excels it in the violence of its outbursts.

The eruptions between 1866 and 1870, when, according to Reclus, no less than 50,000 of partial eruptions were counted in five years, drew spectators from all parts of the world, including some men of science, whose observations made a distinct addition to our knowledge of volcanic action. In that period the ashes were sometimes thrown to a height of 4,000 feet and the immense outpourings of scoriae more than doubled the size of the island of Nea Kammeni.

Old reliable Stromboli, on its island 30 miles west of the Italian province of Calabria, can always be counted on to present the same kind of intensity of phenomena. The latest report says that seven craters are active, and that the volcano is "showing its normal explosive activity." Every few minutes lava bubbles up in the crater, explosions are heard and stones are tossed into the air. The spectacle, particularly at night, is pleasing, and the island olive growers gather their crop without fear that Stromboli will ever misuse them. It has its moments of irritation, however, and then the ashes may rise so high into the air as to be carried off to the coast of Calabria.

TOBACCO IN IRELAND.

The Growing of It Promises to Be a Profitable Industry in Coming Years.

During the year just closing a very extensive and interesting series of experiments in tobacco culture has been made in Ireland, and the results so far as can be judged at the moment are most satisfactory, says a London paper.

It appears that in 1899 Col. Everard, of Randlestown house, County Meath, made a great success in growing a plot of tobacco, and in consequence of this the Irish Agricultural Organization society planned a series of experiments in various parts of Ireland. The Irish department of agriculture took over the matter early in the year, and after a correspondence with a number of continental tobacco experts appointed Prof. Lecornet, of the Grignan Agricultural college, to superintend them.

In all 25 plots have been planted, the largest and best of all being that of Col. Everard. With the exception of those for Col. Everard's plot, the seedlings were all supplied from one nursery, and were not available until a month after the proper time for planting out. This year's experiments tend to prove that tobacco can be grown as well in Ireland as in the north of France, and it remains to be seen whether when manufactured the half ton of tobacco leaves, which are available from this year's experiment, will prove of good quality.

The experiment is to be repeated next year, when Prof. Lecornet will select the plots and arrange as to the most suitable manures, seed and varieties of plant to be used. A decisive answer as to the suitableness of Ireland for tobacco-growing ought then to be forthcoming.

Where Little Things Come From.

More small articles of household and office use are manufactured in Newark, N. J., than in any other American city. The output of cheap patented goods is almost incalculable, and in addition there are manufactories of all sizes turning out leathers, jewelry, brass goods, india rubber, celluloid, carriages, enameled cloth, machinery, varnish, chemicals, hats, sewing silk, thread, harness, cotton goods, clothing, boots and shoes, sewing machines, agricultural implements, cutlery, ales, beers and a thousand and one other things. The capital invested in manufactures exceeds $100,000,000.

WAS HAPPY FOR A WHILE.

Woman Wears a Cloak of Quality While Inspecting Inferior Articles.

The shopping woman is the terror of merchants and their employes, but there is seldom seen a manifestation of a peculiar mania of some of the species as fell to the lot of a saleswoman in one of the leading stores of this city a few days ago, reports the Chicago Chronicle. A woman of that station in life whose means evidently did not allow her to indulge in luxuriousness in dress asked a saleswoman to allow her to try on a handsome wrap that was ticketed as being for sale at $85. "I cannot afford to buy it," she said, very frankly, "but I would really like to see how I would look in such a garment if I could afford it." There was no apparent hesitancy in making the statement as to her inability to buy and her reasons for wishing to try on the garment. As at the moment the customers in the department were few, the saleswoman good-naturedly allowed her to try on the coveted wrap. After admiring herself in the cheval mirror for a few moments she turned, with a sigh, and said: "Now, will you please show me something that is within my means—something that will cost about $10 or $12?"

There was no attempt to remove the costly garment. For 20 minutes, by the watch of a man who was there with his wife while the latter was having a garment fitted, this queer woman overhauled the cheap garments and commented on and criticised their lack of style and finish as compared with the one she had on her back, stopping at intervals to admire herself in the glass. Then, with a sigh, she removed the coveted jacket and, without even trying on one of the quality her means might have allowed her to buy, prepared to leave the store. She blandly thanked the saleswoman for allowing her to wear the costly wrap and so securing a brief quarter hour of happiness, and said: "If I decide to buy a new coat this winter I will come around and give you a call. Will you kindly give me your name, so that if I should buy you may have the credit of the sale?"

Ideal Community in Russia.

One of the most interesting districts of Russia is the government of Vyatka, which is very fertile. In it is a well-built town of about 2,000 inhabitants, situated, so to speak, in the backwoods, and named Orloff. It knows neither big landlords nor nobles, and it has not even a governor. There are no factories and no rich philanthropic merchants. Yet there is established a high school for girls, and of the 200 who attend it 190 are daughters of peasants. The fee is about $1.50 per year, and the board and attendance cost only about 27 cents per month, the meals being prepared from provisions supplied by the parents.—N. Y. Sun.

The purpose is to turn out trotters, in which the farm has been eminently successful. The colts now are not trained as trotters on the farm, but the income from sales is large.—San Francisco Chronicle.

WHEN Mr. Perry Belmont observed in a late interview that "the attempt to establish international bimetalism by the United States alone, without the consent of foreign nations, was as foolish as would be the endeavor to create an international postal system in that way" he put his argument in an apt and striking form. International affairs must be regulated by international assent.

Mr. Bryan's Newspaper.

There is not much doubt of the immediate success of Mr. Bryan's latest enterpris. If every Bryanite Democrat who sincerely admires the candidate of 1896 and 1900 and wishes him well should send in his subscription for The Commoner, the money order desk of the Lincoln Postoffice would at once become one of the busiest places in the United States.

Next to real journalistic ability, wide popularity constitutes the most valuable capital which an editor and proprietor can bring to such a newspaper as Mr. Bryan purposes to establish. Its employment by him in that direction is legitimate and respectable. The choice of a profession and means of livelihood during the next three or four years probably lay between this and the law. Nobody could expect Mr. Bryan to resume the sword. The lecture platform, while it might be rewarding in the pecuniary sense, does not offer a career suited to the dignity of Mr. Bryan's recent public prominence. The time is long past when, seriously and without detriment to his self-respect, he could contemplate the theatrical stage as a proper field for his efforts. And for certain reasons of temperanent which we need not discuss, the practice of the law is to Mr. Bryan a less congenial occupation than that which he has deliberately chosen in preference thereto. If a weekly newspaper written by Bryan for Bryan should prove to be a failure, it will be a full twelvemonth before the original subscriptions run out. We do not believe that it will be a failure. Its financial success for one year at least is secured in advance, providing the editor's innumerable friends do their duty at the beginning, and providing likewise that Mr. Bryan is careful that The Commoner does not degenerate into The Communist.

Things to Forget.

If you would increase your life forget your neighbor's faults. Forget the temptations. Forget the peculiarities of your friends, and only remember the good points which made you fond of them; forget all personal quarrels or histories you may have heard by accident and which if repeated would seem a thousand times worse than they are. Blot out as far as possible all the disagreeableness of life; they will come, but they will grow larger when you remember them and the constant thought of acts of meanness or worse still, malice, will only tend to make you more familiar with them. Obliterate everything disagreeable from yesterday; start out with a clean sheet for to-day and write upon it for sweet memory's sake only these things which are lovely and lovable.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 7, 1901.

The Senate has made considerable progress in considering the Army Reorganization bill, and, although no time has been set for a vote, it is believed that the bill will be passed during this week. The date has compelled the opponents of the bill to acknowledge that the troops provided for in the bill are needed in the Philippines. They have been compelled to base their opposition on details of the bill, and some of them have gone so far as to propose furnishing the men in some other way. Their is no likelihood of such a proposition being accepted, however, as, with the exception of Senator Hoar, every Republican is believed to be prepared to vote for the bill. He is the only Republican who has spoken against it. Senator Teller rather amused his colleagues by stating that he withdrew his speech of two years ago, in which he scoffed at imperialism under the American flag, and professed to see imperialism in the acts of the Philippine Commission, which is engaged in setting up civil government in the pacified portions of the Philippines. Some of the Democrats pretend to see in the bill discrimination against the volunteer officers now in the Philippines, but that is the veriest nonsense.

The report on the River and Harbor bill, submitted by Chairman Burton, contains much information concerning the appropriation carried by that bill, a total of $59,935,415. The total number of improvements provided for are 408, of which 232 are rivers and 146 harbors. These were selected from improvements aggregating $300,000,000, which United States Army engineers had estimated for.

Both supporters and opponents of the Oleomargarine bill passed by the House, are putting forth their strongest arguments in the hearings before the Senate Committee on Agriculture. Present indications are that the bill will be favorably reported to the Senate, but whether it will get acted upon will depend upon other legislation largely.

C. A. Snow & Co., of Washington, secured the honor of filing the first application for a United States patent, in the twentieth century, for Dr. Calvin J. Pollock, of Kirkville, Misouri.

Senator McComas predicts the formation of a Socialist party in the United States and that Mr. Bryan will be its leader and candidate for President. He cites Mr. Bryan's speeches in the late campaign as proof that he is already more of a socialist than anything else.

Those who pretended to see antagonism to the Ship Subsidy bill in the vote of the Senate giving the Army Reorganization bill the right of way held by the Shipping Bill are ignoring the facts. It was agreed at the time the Shipping Bill was made the regular business of the Senate that if it were not disposed of when the Army bill, which is an urgency measure, was reported to the Senate it should give way to that measure. That the move was in no way prejudicial to the Shipping Bill was shown by the fact that not a single vote was cast against the motion to put the Army bill ahead.

Some surprise was felt and expressed by the Republican leaders of the House, who had long ago decided that the question of the restriction of suffrage in the South should not be taken up at this session of Congress when Representative Olmsted, without conferring with anyone, and entirely upon his own responsibility, offered a resolution providing that such an investigation should be made before the Reapportionment bill was acted upon. Although Mr. Olmsted had a perfect right to do this, it was somewhat surprising, and of course, could have but one result—the shelving of his resolution, by sending it to the Census Committee. Even if there had been no other objection, it would not be possible to procure the information upon which to make even the most hurried investigation within the life of the present Congress. There was a regrettable wrangle between Chairman Hopkins, of the Census Committee, the author of the Committee Reapportionment Bill, and Representative Littlefield, of Maine, who is supporting the substitute introduced by Representative Burleigh, of Maine, in which both gentlemen used unparliamentary language, and had to be called to order by Acting-Speaker Dalzell. It is natural enough that Mr. Littlefield and the other Maine members should support the Burleigh bill, which retains the present number of members from their state, while the Hopkins bill reduces it by one, but it is none the less regrettable that he should have seen fit to make a personal attack upon Mr. Hopkins in supporting the bill. The fight over this bill is likely to go on all this week. It is entirely outside of party lines.

Hon. M. S. Quay is at his Washington home. When asked whether he entertained any doubts of his election, he said in a very positive tone: "I am just as confident of being elected to the Senate, if I live, as I am if the Pennsylvania legislature will meet on January 15th." Mr. Quay declined to discuss the story that he contemplated resigning shortly after reentering the Senate, but his closest friends say the story is all moonshine, and that, unless something not now expected should occur, should cause him to change his mind, he will serve the entire term. So certain is his election regarded in Washington that he is already being congratulated on his return to the Senate, where he has many warm friends.

"PEARRE'S CORNER."

A Busy Spot for Marylanders at the Capitol.

"Pearre's Corner" is the most frequented spot at the Capitol. It is next to the new electric elevator on the west side of the House wing, and just by the door to the Appropriations Committee room. Across the corridors are the doorkeepers who take in cards to Col. Geo. A. Pearre, of Maryland—that is when Colonel Pearre is not to be found in the corridor with his back glued to the wall, trying to smile and look pleasant, while a semi-circle of political seekers besiege him.

From Maryland and Virginia the applicants for favors come in hordes, more from Maryland, because this is a Republican administration and because Maryland sends several Republicans to Congress. They lie in wait about a Representative's domicile; they waylay him on the Capitol steps; they pursue him as he tries to fly for a retreat in his committeeroom. There is never any let up for a member of the House from an adjacent Maryland or Virginia district.

Two of the Baltimore statesmen, Wachter and Denny, the latter a Democrat, escape to Baltimore at night and thus enjoy a little respite, or if they abide in Washington no man knows their habitations. When Wachter was young at the business he faced the clamor of applicants boldly for three or four hours daily, but he got a nervous and haunted look, and now it is more difficult to find him. On the east corridor Representative Rixey, of Virginia, is likewise a much-sought man, but Mr. Rixey is a Democrat, and that is an excuse that takes the keen edge off an applicant's persistency.

The Black Lick Gold and Silver Mining Company.

Application for a charter under the laws of the State of West Virginia will be made within the next few days for the incorporation of the Black Lick Gold and Silver Mining Company of Maryland. This is the company in which Judge of the Orphans' Court Eli Merrill is interested with Assemblyman Patrick E. Finzel as President. The articles of incorporation are being drawn by Attorney Julius C. Renninger. It is the intention of the stockholders to capitalize the company at $500,000, $50,000 of the stock to be issued and put upon the market at once with the intention of selling it at 20 per cent. in order to raise sufficient capital to instal machinery capable of developing the claim.

At present the work of shafting is going with slow strides owing to the water pouring in upon the workmen. As soon as a pump can be secured it will be placed at the shaft and kept going regularly and in this way it is hoped that the water can be kept down sufficiently so as not to interfere with the operations of the men employed.

The officers and directors of the company elected at a meeting held some days ago are as follows: President, Hon. P. E. Finzel; vice president, A. J. Merrill; secretary, Julius C. Renninger; treasurer, Eli Merrill; directors, the officers above named, with Messrs. Isaac H. Kooken, C. M. Metz, John A. Merrill and S. W. Sibert.

Pennsylvania capitalists have become interested in the working of the mine and are willing to invest their money in it for the purpose of development. Judge Merrill is very sanguine over the ultimate success of the venture and is of the opinion that as soon as the machinery can be purchased and put into operation a great demand for stock will be felt.

A Sensational Elopement.

A Phillipi special to the Wheeling Register says:

A sensation has been caused here by the elopement of Mrs. Frank Owens, wife of the private secretary of Congressman Dayton, with Stephen Holt, a young man well known here. Owens was in Washington where his duties required him, when the flirtation began which ended in the elopement. After they departed from here together they went direct to Washington, and calling on Mr. Owens, told him what they had done. He took the first train for Phillipi and instituted a suit for divorce. Mrs. Owens took her three little children with her. It is reported they are living together now at Clarksburg.

OAKLAND CLUB MEETING.

The Library Committee Submits an Interesting Report. Letter From President Procter.

Friday night last the monthly meeting of the Oakland Club was held when the committee on library submitted a report which is both interesting and shows that the committee has been at work endeavoring to accomplish something that will be of lasting benefit to the organization. A letter from President Percy Procter was also read in which that gentleman conveyed to the members of the club the compliments of the season and made some valuable suggestions for the future welfare of the organization.

The Library Committee's report is as follows:

To the President and Members of the Oakland Club.

We, as the Committee on Library, submit the following report:

Last month there was presented to the Club by the worthy President, Mr. Percy Procter, the bound volumns of the Century Magazine, covering the period of the last ten years, viz., 1890 to 1900 inclusive.

This is a very handsome present and the committee suggests that the Club tender a vote of thanks to the donor.

The President made the suggestion to the committee that it would add to the attractiveness of the reading rooms, especially to the ladies of the members' families, if there could be obtained from a central free library books for a short period of time. This committee acting on the suggestion immediately wrote to Miss Mamie Perry, assistant librarian of the Pratt Library, Baltimore, asking her if books could be so loaned, also for any other information on the subject that she might possess. As yet we have received no reply but hope to have a report at the next meeting of the Club. We believe that if an arrangement could be made to obtain books from a free library for a short length of time the reading rooms would be much improved and that the ladies would find it a more pleasant place to spend the afternoons than they now do.

The committee has also written to Senator McComas and Hon. George A. Pearre, Congressman from this District, asking them to obtain for the Club such books as they, as members of Congress are able to get. The answer of Hon. Geo. A. Pearre is herewith given.

Mr. McCullough Brown, one of this committee, has notified us that he has purchased and had mounted a map of Garrett county which he will present to the Club. Although the map has not yet been received the Committee suggests a vote of thanks be tendered Mr. Brown.

While the committee has accomplished comparatively little as yet toward the welfare of the Club, it stands ever ready and willing to contribute so far as lies in its power to make this club not only the most pleasant and attractive place in Oakland but also a model club which shall be the basis of similar organizations to be formed in other small towns in the country. In pursuance of this policy this committee intends at once to communicate with persons of standing to enlist their services to put the Club and library on a good footing.

CHAS. H. LOAR,
Chairman Committee on Library.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 1, 1901.

C. H. Loar and John T. Sincell, Oakland, Md.

GENTLEMEN:—I have your favor of December 29th, stating that Oakland Club proposes the formation of a library for the use of its members, and asking me to furnish such publications as may be available to me as member of Congress. In reply I beg to say that it will give me great pleasure to send you such publications as may come into my hands.

Wishing you a Happy New Year, I am Very truly yours,

GEO. A. PEARRE.

Mr. Procter's letter is as follows:

GENTLEMEN:—Allow me first to wish you all a happy and prosperous New Year.

I hope that all the chairmen of all the special committees have called the members together, elected secretaries, arranged for regular meetings and outlined the duties to be performed. Last year, the first of the Club's existence, was one of experiment; this year should be one of action. Each committee can do something that will benefit the town, and to benefit the town means to help ourselves. I think that each committee should meet once a month at least, the secretary of the committee notifying the members of the time of meeting, and accomplish something at every meeting. All movements in the larger cities toward improvement, both in attractiveness and business, emanate from commercial and social organizations such as is the Oakland Club.

I urge each member to constitute himself a committee of one to bring up the membership of the Club to the limit of one hundred. We can maintain the Club on the income of dues from fifty members only, but we should have the dues of a second fifty with which to pay for advertising matter, for prizes, for entertainments, for committees expenses and for a club house. This money all will come back to us in one way or another. Prospective members can be reached by one of these inducements. Some men will join because of the games, the reading matter and the social features. Others will join because they think a Club like ours should be maintained as a beneficial place of resort for men seeking company. Others still will join the Oakland Club from motives of pure public spirit, believing that the organization is a good thing for the town and willing to contribute the amount of the annual dues for its support. Care should be taken to invite men to join who are able to pay the dues promptly and who will stay in after they are elected.

The Oakland Club is a unique organization, there being nothing like it in any other town of the size of ours. It is being watched by people elsewhere, and if it maintains a healthy existence similar clubs will spring up in towns and villages all over the United States. But remember our motto: "Nihil Sine Labori"—"Nothing can be be accomplished without work."

TUB TRUTHS.

A DROP of ink will color a whole glass of water. It is an inch of yeast which makes a pan of bread rise, and a single cake of soap containing unabsorbed alkali can ruin a hundred times its cost in laces and fine embroidery. After all, is it wise to take such risks with common soap? Of course you can get along without Ivory Soap. So can a wagon without axle grease—but it goes hard.

Help... Nature

Babies and children need proper food, rarely ever medicine. If they do not thrive on their food something is wrong. They need a little help to get their digestive machinery working properly.

SCOTT'S EMULSION OF COD LIVER OIL WITH HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME & SODA will generally correct this difficulty.

If you will put from one-fourth to half a teaspoonful in baby's bottle three or four times a day you will soon see a marked improvement. For larger children, from half to a teaspoonful, according to age, dissolved in their milk, if you so desire, will very soon show its great nourishing power. If the mother's milk does not nourish the baby, she needs the emulsion. It will show an effect at once both upon mother and child.

50c. and $1.00, all druggists.

TO BENEFIT STATE BANKS.

Treasurer Vandiver Maturing a Plan to Throw Safeguards About These Institutions.

State Treasurer Murray Vandiver was in conference Monday with Bank Examiner Col. W. E. Griffith in connection with a plan which the State treasurer is preparing for the government of the various financial institutions under control of the State. Col. Griffith, who is a national bank examiner, performs similar service for the State, covering State banks, etc.

Treasurer Vandiver is engaged in examining the charters of these institutions, and is maturing a plan to throw greater safeguards about these institutions for the further protection of depositors. There has been no complaint against any of these institutions, but, in view of the suspension of business recently by a State bank, the State treasurer considers it advisable to surround the State banks and trust companies which receive deposits with all possible safeguards, without affecting their business or legitimate operations. National banks, as is known, are under the control of the federal government, and stockholders are responsible double the amount of their stock for such time such bank may be embarrassed.

Bloomington—Delayed.

Never in the history of our town has Santa Claus been more royally welcomed nor the Christmas holidays more universally observed than the one that has just closed—the nineteenth century. The church people led off on Christmas eve with a splendid entertainment that delighted a house crowded to the doors. Later on the swells directed the celebration and with cannon crackers that shook the town, tin horns, anything and everything that could make a noise, kept up the din till morning—everybody entered into the spirit of the occasion and old Kris Krinkle must have felt very proud at the magnificent reception we tendered him.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Warnick returned home Monday after spending the holidays with relatives near Tunnelton.

Mrs. J. Silcott and little daughter Hattie, of Pennsboro, W. Va., who have been guests of Dr. Kemp's family for the past few days, left for home Monday morning.

Miss Lizzie Tibbetts, oldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Freely Tibbetts, of Clarksburg, is the guest of friends and relatives in this vicinity.

John H. Smith moved to Corinth, W. Va., last week.

John Harmon, of Barnum, one of the oldest German residents of Garrett, was in town Monday on business.

Mrs. Shafer, of Cumberland, sister of the late John Collins, is visiting Mrs. Maggie Collins.

A Mr. Martin and Miss Fox were married in the county road between this place and Westernport on last Monday morning. The ceremony was short and brief and was performed by Rev. Howard, of this place.

Mr. and Mrs. John McMahon entertained a number of friends at their home on New Year's eve. An oyster supper was served at ten o'clock, after which the party danced the old year out and the new one in.

There are, so the report goes, a number of immoral women in Oakland whose company the community could very well do without. These women are not only a disgrace to their own sex but also to the town and should be driven out. The town officials have the power to remove them and it should be done at once.

Any plan for the improvement of the roads so that the intolerable mud may be knocked out for even any part of the year, will be better than the present lack system. But under a system of scientific roads there will be plenty of reason for the farmers and others who use the roads to throw up their hats.

The town of Deer Park is now connected by telephone with the other towns of the county, the line having been finished from that point to the Oakland central office Tuesday. The new line is owned by the Garrett County Telephone Company and its patrons will be given the privilege of "helloing" to our sister town without extra charge.

Twelve complete sets of scenery, over two thousand square yards, all on a magnificent scale, and adjustible to any sized stage, are carried by the Frank Davidson company. This assures absolute scenic perfection to each of the plays presented, and will virtually make a new stage in our Opera House; all of the stock scenery being removed. Such a display of mechanical effect was never before attempted and is said to be alone worth seeing. The dates are Jan. 17, 18 and 19.

Thus far during the season numerous ice houses have been filled with the best quality of ice cut from the ponds and lakes about town. The ice averages about nine inches in thickness and is as clear as crystal. At the Park Superintendent Rudisill has begun filling the company's house in which 1,500 tons will be stored for next summer's use. He expects to ship some ice this winter to points along the B. & O.

Within the past two or three years Garrett county has made wonderful strides in the production of coal and other minerals In nearly every section mines have been opened and are being successfully worked. Washington is preparing to have the biggest inauguration that they ever had on the occasion of the second accession of McKinley to the Presidential chair. They have already raised the $50,000 necessary to pay the expenses of the affair. There are to be more soldiers in line than there has been for many years, since the close of the civil war in fact.

A meeting of the Accident Creamery Company was held this week at the office of the corporation when the old officers were re-elected for another year with the single exception of Mr. W. M. Lohr, whose duties as County Treasurer require his entire attention. Mr. C. C. Speicher was elected in his stead as one of the Board of Directors.

A meeting of the stockholders of the First National Bank was held on Tuesday of this week when the entire Board of Directors as selected at the organization of the institution were elected to serve for a term of one year. Mr. Fred. A. Thayer was again elected president; M. N. Wilson, vice prefident; U. G. Palmer, cashier, and Mr. M. R. Hamill, assistant cashier.

Good-bye to the good roads that we have had all fall and winter. This county will not know what it is to have good roads all the year round as it should until the plan of building roads on scientific principals is followed. Why the old plan is still followed although there is every reason against it is hard to understand yet we do follow it and the chances are that it will be followed until the end of the chapter.

The following unique claim is posted on a mine in the Grand Encampment, in Wyoming: "We found it, and we claim it by the right of founding it. It's our'n. It's 750 feet in every direction except southwest and northeast, and there is 300 feet on each side of this writin'. It's called the Bay Horse, and we claim even the spurs, and we dont want nobody jumping on this Bay Horse—that's what these trees is around here for, and we've got the same piece of rope that we had down in old Missouri."

The week of prayer is being observed in St. Paul's M. E. church in Oakland and is being conducted by the pastor, Rev. Asbury Mick. At the end of the week the meeting may be continued indefinitely, the pastor having sent out cards to his membership asking their help in the conducting of a revival or protracted meeting.

A recent ruling of the Postoffice Department prohibits us from mailing to our patrons along with the regular issue of our paper the calendar we have prepared for distribution and in consequence we will be compelled to procure envelopes and send the calendars out in them, which we hope to do the latter part of this week.

It is stated by the Uniontown papers that the sale of fire arms is increasing rapidly down there and that nearly every one goes about armed to the teeth. One of the papers warns women who are left alone at night to refuse to open the doors on any pretext and it also warns people to look out how they walk around at night. There have been innumerable hold-ups and murders in the town and county.

Local housewives can now have a chance to pay for the fight that the coffee and sugar men have been waging for some time as the rivals have agreed to get together and bury the hatchet. They will now make the dear public pay for the losses incurred in cutting each others throats and the fight that has been hailed with so much joy by those who were profiting by it will then be seen to be a bad thing for us since we have to pay the bills.

The Messrs. Speicher Bros., of Accident, Md., have the goods on the way for their new store, which they purchased in the eastern cities last week. This will make the third store for that enterprising little town. Until recently these young men were farmers, but having disposed of their farm, they now enter into business lines in which we hope they will be very successful. Mr. C. A. Bender, of Grantsville, Md., a veteran in merchandising, accompanied the representative of the firm east and assisted in selecting the first stock of goods.—Meyersdale Commercial.

John Reynolds was before Justice Gonder Monday afternoon charged with having poured oil upon the person of Richard Kerens and setting it on fire. Reynolds conducts a saloon on Second street and Kerens went into his place the night before Christmas where he indulged to some extent, after which the proprietor of the place "jokingly" made a human torch of Kerens whose whiskers, hair and eye lashes were almost completely singed off. Reynolds was fined which with the costs of the prosecution amounted to $8.00, which was paid.

Many of our friends while in town this week attending the sessions of the farmers' institute and the meeting of the County Commissioners, made us pleasant visits, among the number being Messrs. James H. Wilson, Elisha Aronhalt, James Aronhalt, R. P. Davis, James Chisholm, Sidney Harvey, J. H. Sanders and Chas. E. Hilleary, all of District No. 8; Election Supervisor C. E. Ellithorp, ex-County Treasurer Thomas B. Wiley, Joel Orendorf and Jonas Bittinger, of District No. 12; J. G. Elsey, Esq., of near Cranesville; Andrew Sebold, of near McHenry, and others.

The Maine man who has been engaged for 20 years in trying to find an ear of corn with an odd number of rows might learn a lesson from the old slave who succeeded in finding one and thus won his freedom. While the corn was still growing and the rows had but formed on the ears, he carfully pulled down the husks and with his pen-knife scrapped out a row. The corn matured in due season and the slave easily met the conditions upon which he was to be set free. That the number of rows of corn is always even under normal conditions is no more remarkable than is the fact that a capital M may be seen on the back of every blade of oats just before that grain has begun to ripen. On some blades it may not be well defined but it is there nevertheless and in many cases, as distinct as if the impression were made with type.

Suit for Divorce.

Susan Zwoll, wife of Lawrence Zwoll, of near Thayerville, has entered suit in Allegany county for absolute divorce, charging desertion.

Local Institute.

A local teachers' institute will be held in the Oakland Public School building on Saturday, the 19th inst., for which an interesting program has been prepared by the committee.

At the morning session, which will begin at 9.30 o'clock, after the exercises incident to the opening, the sentiment roll will be called. Miss Jennie Miller will read a paper. Prof. C. S. Friend will discuss the subject, "Promotion of Pupils," and Mr. W. E. Beeghley will talk upon the "Science of Teaching." "Teachers' Examinations" will also form a subject for discussion, which will be participated in by Mr. S. H. Ralston and Miss Mae Evy.

In the afternoon at 1.30 "Phonetics" will be discussed by J. H. Lawson. Prof. J. S. Gnegy will tell of his experiences during the past summer in the gold fields of the Cape Nome district—a subject which cannot fail to interest the public as well as the teachers. Miss Lizzie Leary will tell of her experience in teaching Primary Reading. Miss Mollie Hamill will read a paper on "Moral Culture." Examiner Browning will close the institute with an address.

Coal Lands Sold.

The latter part of last week three parcels of land in the coal basin along the Potomac river in this county changed hands and became the property of the West Virginia Coal Company or the Elkins syndicate. While three parcels were sold the mineral under but one of them became the property of the coal company, the surface being purchased with the intention of laying out a town and erecting buildings suitable for the miners to be employed when the when the works are put in active operation. These lands lie up in District No. 8, adjacent to the West Virginia Central Railroad.

From R. P. Davis, Esq., 100 acres of surface was bought for which $2000 was paid by the company. J. T. Conneway sold 125 acres and received $2800. Daniel Conneway sold the mineral right under 137 acres for the sum of $5000. A shaft will be put down and operations begun immediatety upon the property.

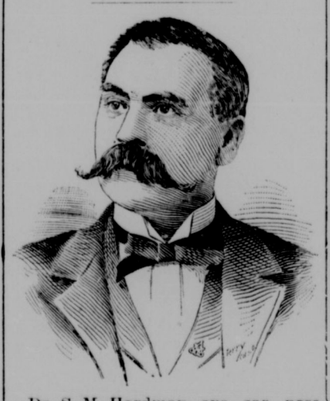
An Attempted Robbery

Ernest Harne, son of Mr. A. J. Harne, of Oakland, a young man who assists his brother with the delivery of express goods in Oakland, was held up Saturday night and again Sunday night at the corner of Third and Centre streets in Oakland and asked if he had delivered a package of money to a lady which had arrived Saturday afternoon late on a train from the east. Being answered in the negative the men warned him to keep the matter quiet or he would be severely dealt with.

It is presumed that the men intended to rob the lady had the money been delivered to her.

Struck By an Engine.

B. O. Sharpless, aged about nineteen years, was struck by train No. 72 at Swanton last Saturday afternoon while attempting to run across the tracks ahead of the train. His leg was broken and he was badly bruised but not fatally hurt. He was carried some distance on the pilot of the engine and thrown off again before the train came to a stop.



Dr. S. M. Hardman, eye, ear, nose and throat specialist, Grafton, W. Va. Spectacles and artificial eyes fitted.

Accident on the Grade.

Saturday night last passenger train No. 12 ran into helping engine No. 1930 on the 17-mile grade and caused a slight wreck. The engineer of the helper stated that he was going down the grade at the rate of 20 miles per hour when the engine hauling No. 12 ran into him.

Theatre goers differ largely in taste. Some enjoy drama, some orchestral music, some band music, some are appealed to more strongly by specialties, songs, dances, etc. Others are reached through the eye, beautiful scenery, elaborate stage settings, elegant costumes, correct colorings and artistic groupings please them above all else. The attraction gathering together and presenting all these things in a first-class manner is the one that will please everybody. The Frank Davidson Company has done this very thing, and is reaping a harvest. They will be at the Opera House for three nights beginning Thursday evening, January 17 and the people of this city will be with them.

THE FARMERS' INSTITUTE.

Interesting Sessions Held in the Court House Monday and Tuesday.

The Director of the State Farmers' Institutes, Prof. Wm. L. Amos, called the Garrett county farmers' institute to order on Monday afternoon at 1.30 o'clock in the court house here for a session of two days, this being the first institute for the year held in the State.

At every session the court room was crowded to the doors by interested farmers from all sections of the county who listened to the theories advanced by the lecturers very attentively and we have no doubt they were greatly benefited thereby.

MONDAY AFTERNOON SESSION.

The director and others were gratified on account of an additional appropriation which assures a longer institute. We are assured that by a concerted action of the people and some gratuitous work institutes can be held at points of the county.

The director insisted that written questions be presented for discussion and needful information will be freely given.

The director insisted on the people of this county to raise more and better stock on account that the western stock ranges are being occupied for farming purposes instead of stock raising.

Capt. R. W. Sglvester, president of the Agricultural College, was then introduced and discussed the question, "Why we Educate." The professor showed very clearly that natural laws are in operation all around us which influence our vegetables and animals and for us to understand their operation and results as soon as possible. It has been shown that one half of the value of a corn stalk is in the fodder if properly prepared. By having a practical knowledge of the raw material we can transform them into finished product economically. Again, our boys are educated from the farm instead of for the farm.

Prof. H. J. Patterson was then introduced and took up the subject of "Theory and Science on the Farm." The professor showed that State inspection of fertilizers saves over fifty per cent. to the farmers. By applying scientific principles in combining proper foods gave much better results in producing beef or milk than has been done in the past. He showed that the Babcock test is needful to the dairyman, both by producer and the consumer.

Science shows us that plants become diseased equally to the human and the animal and remedies are being found to restore them to health.

The bulletins published by the Experiment Station are free to every one in the State by the asking for them. There are forty thousand farmers in the State and only eight thousand have asked for the Bulletin.

Director Amos urges the farmers to send our sons and daughters to the Agricultural College and take the short course of study if the longer course cannot be secured.

Mr. Steward, agricultural agent B. & O. R. R., was then introduced. He says the largest part of this county is well adapted to apple growing, but many orchards are sadly neglected, both in the way of pruning and cultivation. He showed the importance of hand-picking and careful packing and shipping directly to the markets.

Mr. C. M. Miller says an apple tree should be carefully pruned and shaped properly in the early stages.

Captain Sylvester also spoke of the great importance of cultivating the orchard.

Question, "Is a Silo Profitable?" answered in the affirmative by Prof. Patterson.

MONDAY EVENING SESSION.

Mr. Stewart spoke, subject "Nature Study for Boys and Girls." He recommends nature study every day or two in the public schools, such as the propogation of plants and vines from stems, vines and seeds and how light seeds are carried by the wind to propogate a new plant or tree. The farmers sow the heavy seed to produce crops. We were reminded that school lots should be decorated with trees and shrubbery.

TUESDAY MORNING SESSION.

Director Amos gave an interesting talk introductory to the important day's work.

Prof. Patterson gave a splendid talk on the subject of "Commercial Fertilizers." He urged the farmers to make the best use of stable manure. As far as practicable take the manure from the stable and spread upon the ground at once.

We are told that we can raise a sufficient quantity of nitrogen upon the farm by producing clover and other legume crops. To make the plant food already in the ground available a well pulverized soil is necessary, and in addition to this the application of lime changes the chemical condition of the soil to a profit.

Bulletin No. 66 from the Experiment Station fully explains the value of lime. Can be had by the asking.

The soils are most deficient in phosphoric acid. Phosphoric acid can be secured from the bone, South Carolina rock, blood, meat, fish and other sources and is equal in value from whatever source it is obtained.

Bulletin No. 68 from the Experiment Station fully explains the true value of phosphoric acid.

Potash if obtained from wood ashes, kanit, munate and other sources, but kanit is the cheapest source. Fruit trees are heavy drawers on the soil for potash. Home mixed fertilizer is the most profitable. Fertilizer should be applied to the ground by the use of a drill for wheat, oats, etc., but for corn and pototoes broadcasting is best.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Question box, "Are the middle grains of corn more prolific than the end grains?" was argued pro and con with the weight of argument in favor of selected grains from the middle of the ear.

Question, "At what age should a boy enter an Agricultural College?" Mr. Sylvester says as soon as he has a good moral character and is well along in a general education.

Question, "What is the proper age of an apple tree to be transplanted?" Answer (by Mr. Steward) the second year. Again we are reminded that commercial fruit growing should only be a few varieties. The Ben Davis is considered the best for shipping.

Question, "What is the best crop to be grown in an Orchard?". Answer, crimson clover.

Mr. Joseph E. King, of Ohio, was then introduced, who gave us a good talk on "Sheep Husbandry," also on "Alfalfa." Alfalfa requires a good, deep, rich soil and makes good hay and pasture. In feeding lambs it is considered best to keep them pretty well housed in good, airy sheds. Corn and clover are considered a balanced ration for lambs; they need need exercise in the yard a short time each day. They good, pure water, and should be kept as quiet as possible. One hundred and twenty days are required to properly fatten lambs. Ration for young lambs, "Wheat bran 45 pounds, chiseled corn 45 pounds, oil meal 10 pounds." This for getting them ready for early market.

Question, "What quantity of Alfalfa seed per acre?" Answer, 15 pounds per acre sown on clean ground and free from any crop.

Prof. Patterson took up the subject, "A Balance Ration, or How and What to Feed." Bulletin No. 69, Experiment Station, fully explains the balanced ration and can be had for the asking. Portein is one of the important parts of a ration and can be supplied most direct by feeding wheat bran, but the cost is too great by having to buy too much. Clover hay has the greatest quantity of portein of our grasses grown here.

THIS WIDOW TROUBLETH ME.

A Police Court Scene—Heart-Broken Mother Strikes Saloon Keeper Who Ruined Her Boy.

"No. 25!"

"Bring in No. 25!"

"The court is waiting for No. 25!"

There is a little hanging back on the part of the usually prompt official, but in a moment more a tall, fine-looking woman was brought in and waited the usual questioning.

There was something so piteously desperate in the prisoner's appearance, and her great haunted eyes had such a look of anguish that the judge, accustomed to all sad sights and sounds, hesitated before asking with unwonted gentleness:

"What is your name, my woman, and where were you born?"

"My name is Aleen Burne, yer honor, an' I were born in Aberdeen, off the Scottish coastland."

"And you are charged with striking a man."

"I am, yer honor."

"And you meant to?"

"I did, indeed, yer honor. He's kilt me, yer honor."

The woman spoke with a low, impassioned wail which caused respectful attention.

"McGinnis testifies that he never laid a hand on you," returned the judge.

"He stabbed me to the heart, yer honor."

"Stabbed you! Suppose you tell me about it."

"I will. Ye might no ken wha' it is, yer honor, to hev one bonnie laddie, an' none else. I lef' the gude father o' my lad a sleeping in the kirkyard when I brought my wee bairnie to this land. For many a year I toiled in sun an' shade for my winsome Robbie. He growed so fine an' tall that he were ta'en to a gentleman's store to help. Then this man McGinnis set his den on my way to an' fra' the bread store, an' he minded 'twas mesel' hated the uncanny look o' the place. An' one morn' as I passed by he said I needn't be so grand about my b'y; he were no above ta'en a sup o' the liquor wi' the rest. I begged my chiel for the love of God to let the stoof alone. Me Robbie promised to bide me wishes; but the mon McGinnis watchet o' the nights when 'twere cauld and stormin', an' gave the lad many a cup o' his dredful drinks, to warm him, he would say. I got on me knees to me bairn and prayed him pass the place no more, but to gang to hame by some other road. Then I went mesel' to the mon, an' p'raps ye ken, yer honor, how a mither wud beg an' pray for the bone o' her bone an' flesh o' her flesh; but he laughed in me face. Las' night, yer honor, the noise at me door frightened me; I runned wi' all me micht to see wha' were the trouble, an' me Robbie swayed into the room an' fell at me feet—he were drunk, yer honor! Then McGinnis poket his face in at the door an' asked: 'Wha' think ye now, Mistress Burne?' Did I mean to strike the mon, yer honor? An' I could, I'd a struck the breth fra' his body! Ye'd better keep me wi' lock an' key till me gloom dies out; but, oh, jedge, jedge, I wish mesel' an' me lad were in the kirkyard aside the gude father! They tell me if I could prove the mon sold liquor to the bairn under age, the law could stop him. I tell ye, jedge, there's naught but God's vengeance can stop his ilk. It's well enough to arrest the mither as strikes the mon as ruins her bairn, but wait ye till the Lord Almighty strikes—aye—wait ye for that!"

"Does the reporter tell no more?" our readers will demand. "Surely the magistrate discharged the woman?" Yes, she was pronounced discharged. But does that meet all the claims of justice? The civil government owes that widow and all the mothers of the land protection from this heartless enemy which for gain seduces and ruins their children. When shall their importunate cry be regarded? We read concerning the importunate widow that at last even the unjust judge said: "I will avenge her, lest by her continual coming she weary me."—Presbyterian Banner.

Tennessee Law Holds Good.

State regulation of the sale of cigarettes has been declared by the United States supreme court to be valid and no infringement of the right of congress to control interstate commerce. The decision was handed down in the case of William B. Austin vs. the state of Tennessee, and sustained the judgment of the Tennessee supreme court upholding the validity of the statute now in force in that state.—Union Signal.

TRACE CRIME TO LIQUOR.

Illinois Jurists Say Lawlessness and Increase in Divorce Can Be Traced to Drink.

Much of the crime of the day and the growing evil of divorces are traceable, Illinois judges declare, to the drink evil, says the Chicago Tribune. Some jurists say that in their opinion half the divorce cases and more than that percentage of criminal cases are caused by the use of alcoholic drinks. These statements are made in response to inquiries made recently by prohibition leaders whose intention is to use the evidence thus gathered in a renewed war on the saloons.

Justice Jacob W. Wilkin, of the state supreme court, refers to and adopts as his own a statement of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Mugler vs. Kansas 137 U. S., which is as follows:

"We cannot shut out of view the fact, within the knowledge of all, that the public safety may be in danger by the general use of intoxicating liquors, nor the fact, established by statistics accessible to everyone, that the idleness, disorder, pauperism and crime existing in the country are, in some degree at least, traceable to this evil."

Replies from the judges of the circuit courts of the state are in part as follows:

A. N. Waterman, Chicago—The use of intoxicating liquors causes many divorces. What proportion it is impossible to tell. Crimes of personal violence, with no element of robbery, are frequently caused by intoxicants, my observance being that one-half of all fights, murders, and assaults, where no robbery or theft is intended, result from this cause. Temperance would tend to lessen crime.

Edward P. Vail, Decatur—While my statement is indefinite, I would say that I have a general notion that a large proportion of both crimes and divorces can be directly traced to the use of liquor.

O. A. Harker, Carbondale—That the liquor habit has caused many divorces, increased court expenses and sent many to the penitentiary and poorhouse every man who has been circuit court judge in Illinois must admit.

A. K. Vickers, Vienna—I have no doubt that a large percentage of crime is traceable directly or indirectly to the excessive use of intoxicants.

John D. Crabtree, Dixon—Probably half of the divorce suits that come into the circuit courts are traceable to the drink evil. It is the most fruitful source of pauperism, crime, riot, disorder, insanity and death known of.

Jefferson Orr, Pittsfield—My experience has been that the drink habit causes divorces, family differences, brawlings, poverty, idleness, insanity and murder. At least one-third of our court expenses is due to this cause.

George W. Herdman, Jerseyville—The use of intoxicating liquors is the curse of curses. During a period of 15 years on the bench I have observed that at least half the crime and half the divorces are directly or indirectly traceable to the drink habit. The habit is the mother of crime.

J. R. Roberts, Cairo—Most prisoners who confess their crimes charge the cause of it to intoxication.

John C. Garver, Rockford—No one questions the evil of the drink habit.

James Shaw, Mount Carroll—Divorces are particularly traceable to the drink habit.

Thomas F. Tipton, Bloomington—I have sent 250 men to the penitentiary, and it is my judgment that all of them committed the crime directly or indirectly on account of drink.

FIRST TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

Interesting Account of Its Organization at Moreau, Saratoga County, N. Y.

The first total abstinence society in the United States is said to have been organized at Moreau, Saratoga county, N. Y., on April 13, 1838. On that date four young men met in the surgery of Dr. B. J. Clark, of that village, then called Clark's Corners, to consider what could be done to stay the tide of drinking habits in the place. After many plans thought of, the temperance society and pledge signing were at last hit upon, and a constitution was framed and a pledge made out which received the four young men's names. Dr. Clark became the president; Gardiner Stow, a young lawyer, the secretary, and Rev. Lybius Armstrong and James Mott, a Quaker farmer, were made a committee to secure members. In a short time the society was enlarged and the name was changed from Moreau to the Moreau and Northumberland Temperance society, which name it bore when the semicentennial celebration took place, April 13, 1888, at Reynold's Corners, two miles north of the site where it first originated.

This was a regular temperance jubilee, with delegates from far and near, and fine speakers and music. "Half a Hundred Years Ago," a poem written and read by a young lady poet of the town, Miss Lura Anna Boire, added much to the exercises. All the original signers were present. Dr. Clark presided, looking hale and hearty after 50 years of hard work as a country doctor. He lived to the ripe old age of 86, working for the cause he so dearly loved, and in his will he left a fund, well invested, the interest of which was to furnish temperance literature to the schools and Sunday schools of his native town.

There is still a temperance society known as the Town of Moreau Temperance society, which holds monthly union services in the three different churches of South Glen Falls—the only village of the town. At the last annual session the principal of the high school, Prof. Sanford, was chosen president. Several quite noted Sunday school and temperance workers had their home and early training in the school district where Dr. Clark's home was situated.—Canadian Royal Templar.

Less Smoking in France.

It is said that French medical men have, to a considerable extent, lately abandoned the use of tobacco. American physicians attending the Paris congress intimate that the government monopoly in tobacco has done much to bring this about. The cigars of the "Regie," that is, those made at the government manufactory, are so bad, they say, and the tax on all other brands so prohibitive, that the thing to do in France is not to smoke at all.

NOTES OF FASHIONS.

What Is Catching the Eyes of the Ladies in Costume Effects for the Winter.

Women who feel the winter cold severely are making their usual purchase of albatross or soft French or Scotch flannel night dresses, which this year are more gracefully shaped and daintily trimmed than ever. For stout figures, the kimono models are made in plain white wool or with delicately colored dots or stripes. A large and varied assortment of these gowns can be found at all the best dry goods houses, says the New York Post.

Some of the new round hats to wear with demi-dress costumes turn up in a very deep curve at each side, and the retrousse portions are entirely covered with ermine fur. The crowns of some of these hats are made of gold-wrought satin; others are of tri-colored panne, and, again, the softly draped center is of white velvet, figured with black silk or chenille dots matching the black and white effects of the fur.

Ribbon scarf ends for the neck, shoulder-knots, belt bows and sleeve straps are finished with small gold aiguillettes; also the long, pliable sash ends of India silk, crepe de chine and liberty satin, on belted tea gowns and expensive French negligees.

A new French model for a tea gown a l'empire is made of lustrous white crepe de chine over orange yellow silk. The soft, beautiful semi-transparent fabric falls in front from a yoke of white lace over orange crepe. The bodice portion at the back and on the side is laid from the yoke in fan-shaped plaits, held at the waist by a pointed girdle, made of orange satin straps laid over silk-covered featherbone. The lace at the throat is gathered into a pretty dog collar of mock pearls, laid over the yellow silk; and the sleeves at the top are close and not more than eight inches in length, but from the lower edge fall the full gathered forearm portions, which are made of the lace and banded at the wrist with the beaded passementerie.

There are but few of the fancy effects in dress that are not repeated upon the sleeves. They are gathered and draped, and tucked, stitched, strapped, buttoned, braided, or laced and trimmed with fine gold braid, beaded applique pieces, plaited frills, laces, nets, velvet ribbon, etc., and the "picture" models on French importations copy the styles of queens and empresses of nearly every age of history, including the open flowing sleeve of Eugenie's time, with undersleeves made of embroidered silk muslin.

Among the winter fads of fashion is that of attaching gold tags to many articles of wear. These vary in size, and on many wearers the effect of these dangling ornaments is somewhat ludicrous; for instance, on a little dumpy woman, her woolen gown trimmed with flying ends of velvet or other ribbon, from which suspend these little metal tags, one might well suppose that an arrangement of gilded bootlaces or staylaces had been devised to furnish a novel decoration for the upper portion of the gown.

Steamed Pudding.

Scald two cupfuls of milk and add one cupful of some cereal food (except oatmeal) and cook seven minutes in a double boiler. Remove from the fire, add a half cupful of molasses, two eggs, two tablespoonfuls melted butter, one tablespoonful of soda and one cupful of dates, stoned and coarsely chopped. Pour in a buttered mold, cover tightly and steam three hours. Serve with a foamy sauce. Cream one-third cupful butter; add one cupful brown sugar and the yolks of two eggs, well beaten, then one-third of a cupful of scalded milk. Cook over hot water till the mixture thickens, then beat in the whites of the eggs whisked to a stiff froth. Flavor with three-fourths of a teaspoonful of vanilla and one-fourth of a teaspoonful of lemon extract. Raisins can be subsituted for the dates, as also figs.—Detroit Free Press.

Oyster Frites a la Bearnaise.

Blanch 24 large oysters in their own juice; drain, and put the oysters in a covered dish with one teaspoonful seasoning salt, one finely-sliced onion, the juice of one lemon, half bunch of parsley, cover and let them marinate one hour. Shortly before serving mix the yolks of two eggs with half cupful milk, one teaspoonful butter, a quarter teaspoonful salt, the same of pepper, two tablespoonfuls flour and the beaten whites of the eggs; wipe the oysters dry, dust with flour, dip in the batter and fry in hot fat to a delicate brown. Pour half pint Bearnaise sauce on a warm dish, dress the oysters over it, and serve with French bread and butter.—Ledger Monthly.

Girls and Fathers.

I always like to see a girl and her father good friends, who can talk like equals about anything that comes up, in the family life or out of it. Such a girl is likely to be level-headed. She is apt to make up her mind more slowly, and to keep it made up when she has once done so, after she has observed the cautious and judicial way in which her father's mind sets to work. —Helen Watterson Moody, in Ladies' Home Journal.

Cream of Chestnut Soup.

Cream of chestnut is a delicious soup, and is made in this way: Peel about 60 chestnuts and blanch until the skin will rub off between the thumb and forefingers, then cook gently in a rich, well-flavored stock until soft enough to rub through a sieve. Dilute to the proper consistency with the stock in which they were cooked and serve very hot with croutons.—People's Home Journal.

A WOMAN'S CLEVER RUSE.

How an American Correspondent Took a Bogus Baby Into a London Crowd.

For ingenuity the American woman journalist is hard to beat, as an incident of the reception in London to the City Imperial volunteers will show, says an exchange of that city.

During the terrific crush a young woman with a baby in her arms was carefully protected by the police. They stood around her, they passed her through the volunteer lines, a mounted officer backed his horse and made a passage for her, an inspector took her arm and deposited her on the pavement, a shopkeeper, taking pity on the infant, lifted her over his barrier and gave her a seat. She saw the procession in comfort, and when the crowd had thinned she went her way profuse in her thanks. I had witnessed the occurrence and it had somewhat startled me, for I thought I recognized the bearer of the infant. When she went up the street I followed her and spoke a name aloud behind her. She turned, and I saw that my suspicion was correct. It was Miss ——, an American lady journalist.

"Why, what do you mean by bringing somebody's baby out with you on such a day as this?" I exclaimed. "Oh, don't give me away!" exclaimed the lady of the pen. "I wanted to see the show from the street and to pick up copy for my paper, and I'm afraid of big crowds because I'm such a little body. I was wondering what I should do, when I remembered that an English crowd is always sympathetic to a woman with a baby. So I brought one with me, and it has answered wonderfully well, I assure you." "A brilliant idea!" I said, "but what about the infant? Weren't you afraid of getting it killed? And where did you find a mother willing to let you have her child for such a desperate purpose?" "Oh, that's all right," exclaimed the lady, with a twinkle in her eye. "This baby could stand a lot of squeezing. Look!"

She gently raised the infant's veil. I gazed at its placid features and burst into laughter. The baby that the police had protected, that the volunteers' officer had championed, that a British crowd had divided to give a safe passage to, the baby for whose sake a sympathetic shopkeeper had presented its terrified mother with a two-guinea seat gratis—was a doll.

The Business Instinct.

Poverty-Stricken Suitor—Sir, I have come to ask you for your daughter's hand.

The Merchant Prince—I am quite willing to believe you love my daughter, but I am anxious to know why you have brought your kodak at such an inopportune time?

"My son, come to my arms; I shall make you a partner in my house."—Collier's Weekly.

Artistic Appreciation.

"Grocer, can't you come down a little on the price of this turkey?"

"Madam, you ask too much; if I knocked off a cent on the price of this elegant turkey my conscience would compel me to come over and help you eat it."—Indianapolis Journal.

A WINDOW BOOKCASE.

Ornamental Piece of Furniture That Can Be Made at the Expense of Very Little Money.

A window bookcase and writing desk is a novel and useful piece of furniture for almost any room, and while it may seem an odd idea for the embellishment of a window, its adaptability can readily be appreciated from a glance at the illustration, which was drawn from a case actually made and in use.

This is a piece of furniture that any carpenter can make from clear pine or white wood at a nominal cost, and it may be painted or stained and varnished as a matter of choice.

An inexpensive one can be constructed from boxes and boards with matched edges, a few feet of cornice molding, some hardware, and with the tools to be found in most any home.

Two boxes of equal size are selected for the base, and to the open sides

doors are attached by means of hinges. These boxes are placed on end so as to support the desk ledge and bookcases.

Three boards are driven together and placed across the upper ends of them, and made fast with screws.

The bookcases can be two long shoe boxes of even size, and arranged with shelves somewhat as shown in the drawing.

Across the top a shelf is placed and made fast. This will bind the cases together and prevent them from moving, while at the same time the bottom of each box can be made fast to the desk top.

Simple curtains of some light material are fastened at the top and halfway down at the front of the cases by means of light rods and rings, so that when desired they may be drawn across to hide the shelving and books.

Drawers can be made in the lower cases to accommodate writing materials, and the closets below them will be quite large enough to harbor magazines, pamphlets, etc.

Half-way from the desk ledge to the top of the window a shelf can be arranged to hold two or three glass bowls from which growing vines can climb on the curtains or on fine wires strung across from case to case.

The shelving in the cases should be placed the proper distances apart to accommodate books of various sizes, the smaller volumes at the top and the larger ones at the bottom as shown.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

BABY'S CREEPING RUG.

It Should Be Made of Strong Material and as Large as the Nursery Will Permit.

The creeping rug has quite taken the place of the creeping bag for the baby, as the former allows more freedom to the little one, who is less hampered than by the clumsy bag gathered about its chubby knees.

For the creeping rug some strong, firm material should be used. Canton flannel is sometimes employed. It should be doubled and the edges bound with bright braid or finished with buttonhole stitching in colored wool. Denim is even more desirable than the flannel, as, having a smoother surface, the child can creep over it more easily and not drag it up into bunches.

The rug is generally bordered with a procession of animals, cut from a contrasting material—cioth, linen or cotton, and appliqued near the outer edge of the rug. Instead of making the animals from a single bright color of cloth, it is better to have the rug of a bright hue and the animals, as far as possible, in natural colors. An effective rug is made of blue denim, with a border of black cats in all possible attitudes and antics.

As to size, the rug should be as large as the nursery will permit. Too small a rug is practically worthless, because the baby is never on it.—N. Y. Tribune.

Woman's Enlarged Sphere.

Women earn their daily bread in almost every branch of human industry. Women make or help to make coffins, bricks, tiles, sewer pipes, tools, boxes, barrels, furniture. They are in all the professions; they are stockholders and partners in various kinds of business, and as to the more conventional occupations of women they are galore. In the more unusual ways we have had a woman anthropologist, a woman forester, women who mine and women who deal in stocks. One woman spent 50 years making a bead house and lately was found dead with her unfinished work before her.

CAROL WITH A CAUTION.

Rev. Dr. Robert Collyer Talks About Christmas Giving and Draws a Moral.

NO MAN ever was more beloved by those who know him than Rev. Dr. Robert Collyer, for many years pastor of the Church of the Messiah, at New York. When asked, a few years ago, to say something about Christmas and Christmas giving he expressed himself as follows:

"When I was a boy in Scotland I used to get up at four o'clock Christmas morning, and a crowd of us would go through the village shouting at the top of our voices: 'A merry Christmas! Wake up! Wake up!' This sounded the keynote to our Christmas. There was little gift-giving; it was necessarily a frugal holiday, but it was full of good-natured merriment and we felt the thrill of the true Christmas spirit. It was and is a glorious time. It is the children's carnival; the midsummer of charity; the spring-tide of good will to men; the time of year when the heavens open and angels come down to sing in the lone reaches of new colonies, to people in hospitals, poorhouses, and mansions, and 'the huts where poor men lie.' I would not degrade the beautiful festival by overdoing it. The man who does most for his fellow-men, according to his means, does best.

"Still, I think it is not hard to see how we may spare even at the Christmas-tide, and do more and better than if we spend. If a man spends the money he ought to save to pay his debts, when he knows very well that he can pay them only by saving, the giving what he buys right and left with an open hand, is to his own shame. Not a penny ought to be laid out in gifts we can well let alone. We should never spend when we ought to spare, especially if we have families. One of the saddest things I have seen in my life has been families left destitute through a certain easy-going generosity in the man out of whose life they sprang, who laid up nothing for a rainy day. I can easily imagine how such a man would be glad to exchange his harp and crown, if he should find himself in Heaven, for good six-per-cent. stock—supposing a man could go there who, through his own carelessness, has left a wife and family of little children without a penny in the world."

NO FRAME HOUSES.

South Africa Uses a Great Deal of Brick and Cement in Building.

South Africa is without a peer as a customer for cement, says United States Consul General Stowe at Cape Town in a recent communication to the department of state, according to the Washington Star. All the buildings there, he says, all the warehouses, stores and residences, are built of brick, cemented on the outside, and no wood or "frame" houses are to be seen.

The bricks used in South Africa are larger than American bricks, and are "laid up" principally with "mud," the inferior clay found in that region, instead of lime mortar or cement. The cement comes into play in the outside finish of the buildings. It is laid over the whole surface, and the expert Malay masons in South Africa produce very pleasing and unique effects in finishing up caps, columns and moldings, closely imitating the natural stone in this decorative work. A striking effect is produced by "spattering" some of the larger buildings with cement, which presents a rough exterior very striking and pleasing to the eye, and also durable.

The greater part of the cement imported into South Africa last year, states the consul general, came from Great Britain, and over 125,000,000 pounds into the country, all told. "When I left the United States," says Mr. Stowe, "our manufacturers of cement were producing an article which was proved by tests to be as good as the English, and that cement ought to find a large market here. While the United States at the present time would be hampered on account of the excessive steamship rates to this country, which would prevent competition with the German and Belgian cements, yet I am convinced with equal rates the United States cement could find a market here in large quantities. Cement of the desired quality will never be manufactured here, as the ingredients do not exist."

Best Way to Treat Sprains.

In treating a sprain wring a folded flannel out of boiling water by laying it in a thick towel and twisting the ends in opposite directions; shake it to cool it a little, lay it on the painful part and cover it with a piece of dry flannel. Change the fomentations until six have been applied, being careful not to have them so hot as to burn the skin. Bandage the part if possible and in six or eight hours repeat the application. As soon as it can be borne rub well with extract of witch hazel.—Ladies' Home Journal.

Paint Spots on Dress.

If these are rubbed at once with turpentine they come off quite easily, but if they have been allowed to dry a little ammonia should be mixed with the turpentine, provided it is a "fast color" material. If the color is one that is likely to be injured, drop a little sweet oil on the spot, then rub with turpentine, removing the grease spot afterward by rubbing with benzine or ether.

THIS WIDOW TROUBLETH ME.

A Police Court Scene—Heart-Broken Mother Strikes Saloon Keeper Who Ruined Her Boy.

"No. 25!"

"Bring in No. 25!"

"The court is waiting for No. 25!"

There is a little hanging back on the part of the usually prompt official, but in a moment more a tall, fine-looking woman was brought in and waited the usual questioning.

There was something so piteously desperate in the prisoner's appearance, and her great haunted eyes had such a look of anguish that the judge, accustomed to all sad sights and sounds, hesitated before asking with unwonted gentleness:

"What is your name, my woman, and where were you born?"

"My name is Aleen Burne, yer honor, an' I were born in Aberdeen, off the Scottish coastland."

"And you are charged with striking a man."

"I am, yer honor."

"And you meant to?"

"I did, indeed, yer honor. He's kilt me, yer honor."

The woman spoke with a low, impassioned wail which caused respectful attention.

"McGinnis testifies that he never laid a hand on you," returned the judge.

"He stabbed me to the heart, yer honor."

"Stabbed you! Suppose you tell me about it."

"I will. Ye might no ken wha' it is, yer honor, to hev one bonnie laddie, an' none else. I lef' the gude father o' my lad a sleeping in the kirkyard when I brought my wee bairnie to this land. For many a year I toiled in sun an' shade for my winsome Robbie. He growed so fine an' tall that he were ta'en to a gentleman's store to help. Then this man McGinnis set his den on my way to an' fra' the bread store, an' he minded 'twas mesel' hated the uncanny look o' the place. An' one morn' as I passed by he said I needn't be so grand about my b'y; he were no above ta'en a sup o' the liquor wi' the rest. I begged my chiel for the love of God to let the stoof alone. Me Robbie promised to bide me wishes; but the mon McGinnis watchet o' the nights when 'twere cauld and stormin', an' gave the lad many a cup o' his dredful drinks, to warm him, he would say. I got on me knees to me bairn and prayed him pass the place no more, but to gang to hame by some other road. Then I went mesel' to the mon, an' p'raps ye ken, yer honor, how a mither wud beg an' pray for the bone o' her bone an' flesh o' her flesh; but he laughed in me face. Las' night, yer honor, the noise at me door frightened me; I runned wi' all me micht to see wha' were the trouble, an' me Robbie swayed into the room an' fell at me feet—he were drunk, yer honor! Then McGinnis poket his face in at the door an' asked: 'Wha' think ye now, Mistress Burne?' Did I mean to strike the mon, yer honor? An' I could, I'd a struck the breth fra' his body! Ye'd better keep me wi' lock an' key till me gloom dies out; but, oh, jedge, jedge, I wish mesel' an' me lad were in the kirkyard aside the gude father! They tell me if I could prove the mon sold liquor to the bairn under age, the law could stop him. I tell ye, jedge, there's naught but God's vengeance can stop his ilk. It's well enough to arrest the mither as strikes the mon as ruins her bairn, but wait ye till the Lord Almighty strikes—aye—wait ye for that!"

"Does the reporter tell no more?" our readers will demand. "Surely the magistrate discharged the woman?" Yes, she was pronounced discharged. But does that meet all the claims of justice? The civil government owes that widow and all the mothers of the land protection from this heartless enemy which for gain seduces and ruins their children. When shall their importunate cry be regarded? We read concerning the importunate widow that at last even the unjust judge said: "I will avenge her, lest by her continual coming she weary me."—Presbyterian Banner.

Tennessee Law Holds Good.

State regulation of the sale of cigarettes has been declared by the United States supreme court to be valid and no infringement of the right of congress to control interstate commerce. The decision was handed down in the case of William B. Austin vs. the state of Tennessee, and sustained the judgment of the Tennessee supreme court upholding the validity of the statute now in force in that state.—Union Signal.

TRACE CRIME TO LIQUOR.

Illinois Jurists Say Lawlessness and Increase in Divorce Can Be Traced to Drink.

Much of the crime of the day and the growing evil of divorces are traceable, Illinois judges declare, to the drink evil, says the Chicago Tribune. Some jurists say that in their opinion half the divorce cases and more than that percentage of criminal cases are caused by the use of alcoholic drinks. These statements are made in response to inquiries made recently by prohibition leaders whose intention is to use the evidence thus gathered in a renewed war on the saloons.

Justice Jacob W. Wilkin, of the state supreme court, refers to and adopts as his own a statement of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Mugler vs. Kansas 137 U. S., which is as follows:

"We cannot shut out of view the fact, within the knowledge of all, that the public safety may be in danger by the general use of intoxicating liquors, nor the fact, established by statistics accessible to everyone, that the idleness, disorder, pauperism and crime existing in the country are, in some degree at least, traceable to this evil."

Replies from the judges of the circuit courts of the state are in part as follows:

A. N. Waterman, Chicago—The use of intoxicating liquors causes many divorces. What proportion it is impossible to tell. Crimes of personal violence, with no element of robbery, are frequently caused by intoxicants, my observance being that one-half of all fights, murders, and assaults, where no robbery or theft is intended, result from this cause. Temperance would tend to lessen crime.

Edward P. Vail, Decatur—While my statement is indefinite, I would say that I have a general notion that a large proportion of both crimes and divorces can be directly traced to the use of liquor.

O. A. Harker, Carbondale—That the liquor habit has caused many divorces, increased court expenses and sent many to the penitentiary and poorhouse every man who has been circuit court judge in Illinois must admit.

A. K. Vickers, Vienna—I have no doubt that a large percentage of crime is traceable directly or indirectly to the excessive use of intoxicants.

John D. Crabtree, Dixon—Probably half of the divorce suits that come into the circuit courts are traceable to the drink evil. It is the most fruitful source of pauperism, crime, riot, disorder, insanity and death known of.

Jefferson Orr, Pittsfield—My experience has been that the drink habit causes divorces, family differences, brawlings, poverty, idleness, insanity and murder. At least one-third of our court expenses is due to this cause.

George W. Herdman, Jerseyville—The use of intoxicating liquors is the curse of curses. During a period of 15 years on the bench I have observed that at least half the crime and half the divorces are directly or indirectly traceable to the drink habit. The habit is the mother of crime.

J. R. Roberts, Cairo—Most prisoners who confess their crimes charge the cause of it to intoxication.

John C. Garver, Rockford—No one questions the evil of the drink habit.

James Shaw, Mount Carroll—Divorces are particularly traceable to the drink habit.

Thomas F. Tipton, Bloomington—I have sent 250 men to the penitentiary, and it is my judgment that all of them committed the crime directly or indirectly on account of drink.

FIRST TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

Interesting Account of Its Organization at Moreau, Saratoga County, N. Y.

The first total abstinence society in the United States is said to have been organized at Moreau, Saratoga county, N. Y., on April 13, 1838. On that date four young men met in the surgery of Dr. B. J. Clark, of that village, then called Clark's Corners, to consider what could be done to stay the tide of drinking habits in the place. After many plans thought of, the temperance society and pledge signing were at last hit upon, and a constitution was framed and a pledge made out which received the four young men's names. Dr. Clark became the president; Gardiner Stow, a young lawyer, the secretary, and Rev. Lybius Armstrong and James Mott, a Quaker farmer, were made a committee to secure members. In a short time the society was enlarged and the name was changed from Moreau to the Moreau and Northumberland Temperance society, which name it bore when the semicentennial celebration took place, April 13, 1888, at Reynold's Corners, two miles north of the site where it first originated.

This was a regular temperance jubilee, with delegates from far and near, and fine speakers and music. "Half a Hundred Years Ago," a poem written and read by a young lady poet of the town, Miss Lura Anna Boire, added much to the exercises. All the original signers were present. Dr. Clark presided, looking hale and hearty after 50 years of hard work as a country doctor. He lived to the ripe old age of 86, working for the cause he so dearly loved, and in his will he left a fund, well invested, the interest of which was to furnish temperance literature to the schools and Sunday schools of his native town.

There is still a temperance society known as the Town of Moreau Temperance society, which holds monthly union services in the three different churches of South Glen Falls—the only village of the town. At the last annual session the principal of the high school, Prof. Sanford, was chosen president. Several quite noted Sunday school and temperance workers had their home and early training in the school district where Dr. Clark's home was situated.—Canadian Royal Templar.

Less Smoking in France.

It is said that French medical men have, to a considerable extent, lately abandoned the use of tobacco. American physicians attending the Paris congress intimate that the government monopoly in tobacco has done much to bring this about. The cigars of the "Regie," that is, those made at the government manufactory, are so bad, they say, and the tax on all other brands so prohibitive, that the thing to do in France is not to smoke at all.

NOTES OF FASHIONS.

What Is Catching the Eyes of the Ladies in Costume Effects for the Winter.

Women who feel the winter cold severely are making their usual purchase of albatross or soft French or Scotch flannel night dresses, which this year are more gracefully shaped and daintily trimmed than ever. For stout figures, the kimono models are made in plain white wool or with delicately colored dots or stripes. A large and varied assortment of these gowns can be found at all the best dry goods houses, says the New York Post.

Some of the new round hats to wear with demi-dress costumes turn up in a very deep curve at each side, and the retrousse portions are entirely covered with ermine fur. The crowns of some of these hats are made of gold-wrought satin; others are of tri-colored panne, and, again, the softly draped center is of white velvet, figured with black silk or chenille dots matching the black and white effects of the fur.

Ribbon scarf ends for the neck, shoulder-knots, belt bows and sleeve straps are finished with small gold aiguillettes; also the long, pliable sash ends of India silk, crepe de chine and liberty satin, on belted tea gowns and expensive French negligees.

A new French model for a tea gown a l'empire is made of lustrous white crepe de chine over orange yellow silk. The soft, beautiful semi-transparent fabric falls in front from a yoke of white lace over orange crepe. The bodice portion at the back and on the side is laid from the yoke in fan-shaped plaits, held at the waist by a pointed girdle, made of orange satin straps laid over silk-covered featherbone. The lace at the throat is gathered into a pretty dog collar of mock pearls, laid over the yellow silk; and the sleeves at the top are close and not more than eight inches in length, but from the lower edge fall the full gathered forearm portions, which are made of the lace and banded at the wrist with the beaded passementerie.

There are but few of the fancy effects in dress that are not repeated upon the sleeves. They are gathered and draped, and tucked, stitched, strapped, buttoned, braided, or laced and trimmed with fine gold braid, beaded applique pieces, plaited frills, laces, nets, velvet ribbon, etc., and the "picture" models on French importations copy the styles of queens and empresses of nearly every age of history, including the open flowing sleeve of Eugenie's time, with undersleeves made of embroidered silk muslin.

Among the winter fads of fashion is that of attaching gold tags to many articles of wear. These vary in size, and on many wearers the effect of these dangling ornaments is somewhat ludicrous; for instance, on a little dumpy woman, her woolen gown trimmed with flying ends of velvet or other ribbon, from which suspend these little metal tags, one might well suppose that an arrangement of gilded bootlaces or staylaces had been devised to furnish a novel decoration for the upper portion of the gown.

Steamed Pudding.

Scald two cupfuls of milk and add one cupful of some cereal food (except oatmeal) and cook seven minutes in a double boiler. Remove from the fire, add a half cupful of molasses, two eggs, two tablespoonfuls melted butter, one tablespoonful of soda and one cupful of dates, stoned and coarsely chopped. Pour in a buttered mold, cover tightly and steam three hours. Serve with a foamy sauce. Cream one-third cupful butter; add one cupful brown sugar and the yolks of two eggs, well beaten, then one-third of a cupful of scalded milk. Cook over hot water till the mixture thickens, then beat in the whites of the eggs whisked to a stiff froth. Flavor with three-fourths of a teaspoonful of vanilla and one-fourth of a teaspoonful of lemon extract. Raisins can be subsituted for the dates, as also figs.—Detroit Free Press.

Oyster Frites a la Bearnaise.

Blanch 24 large oysters in their own juice; drain, and put the oysters in a covered dish with one teaspoonful seasoning salt, one finely-sliced onion, the juice of one lemon, half bunch of parsley, cover and let them marinate one hour. Shortly before serving mix the yolks of two eggs with half cupful milk, one teaspoonful butter, a quarter teaspoonful salt, the same of pepper, two tablespoonfuls flour and the beaten whites of the eggs; wipe the oysters dry, dust with flour, dip in the batter and fry in hot fat to a delicate brown. Pour half pint Bearnaise sauce on a warm dish, dress the oysters over it, and serve with French bread and butter.—Ledger Monthly.

Girls and Fathers.

I always like to see a girl and her father good friends, who can talk like equals about anything that comes up, in the family life or out of it. Such a girl is likely to be level-headed. She is apt to make up her mind more slowly, and to keep it made up when she has once done so, after she has observed the cautious and judicial way in which her father's mind sets to work. —Helen Watterson Moody, in Ladies' Home Journal.

Cream of Chestnut Soup.

Cream of chestnut is a delicious soup, and is made in this way: Peel about 60 chestnuts and blanch until the skin will rub off between the thumb and forefingers, then cook gently in a rich, well-flavored stock until soft enough to rub through a sieve. Dilute to the proper consistency with the stock in which they were cooked and serve very hot with croutons.—People's Home Journal.

A WOMAN'S CLEVER RUSE.

How an American Correspondent Took a Bogus Baby Into a London Crowd.

For ingenuity the American woman journalist is hard to beat, as an incident of the reception in London to the City Imperial volunteers will show, says an exchange of that city.

During the terrific crush a young woman with a baby in her arms was carefully protected by the police. They stood around her, they passed her through the volunteer lines, a mounted officer backed his horse and made a passage for her, an inspector took her arm and deposited her on the pavement, a shopkeeper, taking pity on the infant, lifted her over his barrier and gave her a seat. She saw the procession in comfort, and when the crowd had thinned she went her way profuse in her thanks. I had witnessed the occurrence and it had somewhat startled me, for I thought I recognized the bearer of the infant. When she went up the street I followed her and spoke a name aloud behind her. She turned, and I saw that my suspicion was correct. It was Miss ——, an American lady journalist.

"Why, what do you mean by bringing somebody's baby out with you on such a day as this?" I exclaimed. "Oh, don't give me away!" exclaimed the lady of the pen. "I wanted to see the show from the street and to pick up copy for my paper, and I'm afraid of big crowds because I'm such a little body. I was wondering what I should do, when I remembered that an English crowd is always sympathetic to a woman with a baby. So I brought one with me, and it has answered wonderfully well, I assure you." "A brilliant idea!" I said, "but what about the infant? Weren't you afraid of getting it killed? And where did you find a mother willing to let you have her child for such a desperate purpose?" "Oh, that's all right," exclaimed the lady, with a twinkle in her eye. "This baby could stand a lot of squeezing. Look!"

She gently raised the infant's veil. I gazed at its placid features and burst into laughter. The baby that the police had protected, that the volunteers' officer had championed, that a British crowd had divided to give a safe passage to, the baby for whose sake a sympathetic shopkeeper had presented its terrified mother with a two-guinea seat gratis—was a doll.

A WINDOW BOOKCASE.

Ornamental Piece of Furniture That Can Be Made at the Expense of Very Little Money.

A window bookcase and writing desk is a novel and useful piece of furniture for almost any room, and while it may seem an odd idea for the embellishment of a window, its adaptability can readily be appreciated from a glance at the illustration, which was drawn from a case actually made and in use.

This is a piece of furniture that any carpenter can make from clear pine or white wood at a nominal cost, and it may be painted or stained and varnished as a matter of choice.

An inexpensive one can be constructed from boxes and boards with matched edges, a few feet of cornice molding, some hardware, and with the tools to be found in most any home.

Two boxes of equal size are selected for the base, and to the open sides

doors are attached by means of hinges. These boxes are placed on end so as to support the desk ledge and bookcases.

Three boards are driven together and placed across the upper ends of them, and made fast with screws.

The bookcases can be two long shoe boxes of even size, and arranged with shelves somewhat as shown in the drawing.

Across the top a shelf is placed and made fast. This will bind the cases together and prevent them from moving, while at the same time the bottom of each box can be made fast to the desk top.

Simple curtains of some light material are fastened at the top and halfway down at the front of the cases by means of light rods and rings, so that when desired they may be drawn across to hide the shelving and books.

Drawers can be made in the lower cases to accommodate writing materials, and the closets below them will be quite large enough to harbor magazines, pamphlets, etc.

Half-way from the desk ledge to the top of the window a shelf can be arranged to hold two or three glass bowls from which growing vines can climb on the curtains or on fine wires strung across from case to case.

The shelving in the cases should be placed the proper distances apart to accommodate books of various sizes, the smaller volumes at the top and the larger ones at the bottom as shown.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

BABY'S CREEPING RUG.

It Should Be Made of Strong Material and as Large as the Nursery Will Permit.

The creeping rug has quite taken the place of the creeping bag for the baby, as the former allows more freedom to the little one, who is less hampered than by the clumsy bag gathered about its chubby knees.

For the creeping rug some strong, firm material should be used. Canton flannel is sometimes employed. It should be doubled and the edges bound with bright braid or finished with buttonhole stitching in colored wool. Denim is even more desirable than the flannel, as, having a smoother surface, the child can creep over it more easily and not drag it up into bunches.

The rug is generally bordered with a procession of animals, cut from a contrasting material—cioth, linen or cotton, and appliqued near the outer edge of the rug. Instead of making the animals from a single bright color of cloth, it is better to have the rug of a bright hue and the animals, as far as possible, in natural colors. An effective rug is made of blue denim, with a border of black cats in all possible attitudes and antics.

As to size, the rug should be as large as the nursery will permit. Too small a rug is practically worthless, because the baby is never on it.—N. Y. Tribune.

Woman's Enlarged Sphere.

Women earn their daily bread in almost every branch of human industry. Women make or help to make coffins, bricks, tiles, sewer pipes, tools, boxes, barrels, furniture. They are in all the professions; they are stockholders and partners in various kinds of business, and as to the more conventional occupations of women they are galore. In the more unusual ways we have had a woman anthropologist, a woman forester, women who mine and women who deal in stocks. One woman spent 50 years making a bead house and lately was found dead with her unfinished work before her.

CAROL WITH A CAUTION.

Rev. Dr. Robert Collyer Talks About Christmas Giving and Draws a Moral.

NO MAN ever was more beloved by those who know him than Rev. Dr. Robert Collyer, for many years pastor of the Church of the Messiah, at New York. When asked, a few years ago, to say something about Christmas and Christmas giving he expressed himself as follows:

"When I was a boy in Scotland I used to get up at four o'clock Christmas morning, and a crowd of us would go through the village shouting at the top of our voices: 'A merry Christmas! Wake up! Wake up!' This sounded the keynote to our Christmas. There was little gift-giving; it was necessarily a frugal holiday, but it was full of good-natured merriment and we felt the thrill of the true Christmas spirit. It was and is a glorious time. It is the children's carnival; the midsummer of charity; the spring-tide of good will to men; the time of year when the heavens open and angels come down to sing in the lone reaches of new colonies, to people in hospitals, poorhouses, and mansions, and 'the huts where poor men lie.' I would not degrade the beautiful festival by overdoing it. The man who does most for his fellow-men, according to his means, does best.

"Still, I think it is not hard to see how we may spare even at the Christmas-tide, and do more and better than if we spend. If a man spends the money he ought to save to pay his debts, when he knows very well that he can pay them only by saving, the giving what he buys right and left with an open hand, is to his own shame. Not a penny ought to be laid out in gifts we can well let alone. We should never spend when we ought to spare, especially if we have families. One of the saddest things I have seen in my life has been families left destitute through a certain easy-going generosity in the man out of whose life they sprang, who laid up nothing for a rainy day. I can easily imagine how such a man would be glad to exchange his harp and crown, if he should find himself in Heaven, for good six-per-cent. stock—supposing a man could go there who, through his own carelessness, has left a wife and family of little children without a penny in the world."

NO FRAME HOUSES.

South Africa Uses a Great Deal of Brick and Cement in Building.

South Africa is without a peer as a customer for cement, says United States Consul General Stowe at Cape Town in a recent communication to the department of state, according to the Washington Star. All the buildings there, he says, all the warehouses, stores and residences, are built of brick, cemented on the outside, and no wood or "frame" houses are to be seen.

The bricks used in South Africa are larger than American bricks, and are "laid up" principally with "mud," the inferior clay found in that region, instead of lime mortar or cement. The cement comes into play in the outside finish of the buildings. It is laid over the whole surface, and the expert Malay masons in South Africa produce very pleasing and unique effects in finishing up caps, columns and moldings, closely imitating the natural stone in this decorative work. A striking effect is produced by "spattering" some of the larger buildings with cement, which presents a rough exterior very striking and pleasing to the eye, and also durable.

The greater part of the cement imported into South Africa last year, states the consul general, came from Great Britain, and over 125,000,000 pounds into the country, all told. "When I left the United States," says Mr. Stowe, "our manufacturers of cement were producing an article which was proved by tests to be as good as the English, and that cement ought to find a large market here. While the United States at the present time would be hampered on account of the excessive steamship rates to this country, which would prevent competition with the German and Belgian cements, yet I am convinced with equal rates the United States cement could find a market here in large quantities. Cement of the desired quality will never be manufactured here, as the ingredients do not exist."

Best Way to Treat Sprains.

In treating a sprain wring a folded flannel out of boiling water by laying it in a thick towel and twisting the ends in opposite directions; shake it to cool it a little, lay it on the painful part and cover it with a piece of dry flannel. Change the fomentations until six have been applied, being careful not to have them so hot as to burn the skin. Bandage the part if possible and in six or eight hours repeat the application. As soon as it can be borne rub well with extract of witch hazel.—Ladies' Home Journal.

Paint Spots on Dress.

If these are rubbed at once with turpentine they come off quite easily, but if they have been allowed to dry a little ammonia should be mixed with the turpentine, provided it is a "fast color" material. If the color is one that is likely to be injured, drop a little sweet oil on the spot, then rub with turpentine, removing the grease spot afterward by rubbing with benzine or ether.

THE FARMING WORLD

IMPROVING A HIVE.

How to Remedy Defects Which Are Apt to Interfere with the Health of Its Occupants.

Fig. 1 shows a hive in quite common use, and one that has really much to commend it. It is dovetailed at the corners, and this fact gives it its name. The beveling of the roof boards, to give the necessary slant, makes the outer edge so thin that it is liable to warp and form a crack, so that wind and storm can blow into the top of the hive.

To remedy this I nailed on strips, as shown in Fig. 2. The end strips are straight-edged pieces of the same length and thickness as the original ones; the side pieces are either rabbeted out or made of two pieces of boards, as shown in Fig. 3.

This gives a cover with some space above the hive, but not enough or in the right shape to put in any covering over the brood chamber. To obviate this I lay the quilting in and hold it in place with two cleats, as shown in Fig. 2. This covering, held up from the brood frames by cross strips, I consider quite essential. The bees themselves would make provision for a way to cross from one brood frame to the other, but their plans are thwarted by the changes incident to the removal of the honey boxes.

I know I lost the first two swarms I tried to winter in the hives in their original shape, and succeeded in carrying two through the following winter in these hives altered as I have indicated. It is very little trouble to make the change, and the hives are much more satisfactory, anyhow.—Richard H. Mitchell, in Country Gentleman.

HORSES IN WINTER.

Feed Liberal Quantities of Nitrogenous Food and Keep the Stables Scrupulously Clean.

Why are horses more spirited, more inclined to go, and in good health generally in winter? Is it because cold is one of the best tonics as an invigorator of digestion, as well as of nervous energy and muscular contractions, says a good authority. Judge a horse by yourself. We all know the invigorating effect of a bright, frosty morning, how the blood tingles and flashes through the veins and the whole system is stimulated as with new wine. Coming out of a morning in the atmosphere pure and sparkling one feels as if he was walking on air. It is the same with the horse. He feels good and sometimes the most staid old Dobbin will fling his heels in the air in the very exuberance of spirits. Heat, on the other hand, takes out the tension from all the tissues, lessens the appetite and enervates all the functions. It is depressing because the appetite and digestion are weakened. Special attention should be given the horse in winter, in view of his peculiar surroundings, so that his health may not suffer. Feed him nitrogenous food, but not too abundant of fat producing material. Have a care to the stable. This is of the utmost importance. Keep the stable clean. None of us need be told what a heat producer stable manure is. Heat causes the rapid escape of ammonia, which causes weakness of eyes, and is injurious to the lungs. Therefore keep the stable well cleaned out. The practice of letting the manure remain in the stable all winter is simply reckless. It should be cleaned out every day.—Rural World.

AMONG THE POULTRY.

One way to warm a vessel of drinking water is to drop a clean, hot stone into it.

It is better not to let the fowls out at all on days when the wind is cold and the snow blows.

Cut cornstalks make the very cleanest of litter for the scratching shed The fowls will eat much of it, too.

An excellent addition to the winter food is very sweet milk, and the fowls may be given all they will drink of it once a day.

"Table scraps" may or may not be good poultry food. We have seen such scraps that might at least be marked "doubtful." Moldy bread, cake and pie, spoiled canned fruits, tainted meat, chunks of salt meat, masses of fat meat, bits of greasy paper, basting strings from roast fowls, cherry pits and many other like articles that are commonly dumped in the chicken bucket had better be thrown on the compost heap or buried.—Farm Journal.

Taking Care of Fall Pigs.

Pigs farrowed in the fall must have better care than those farrowed in the spring, and unless this better care is given them they will give little if any profit. Some breeders say that it is better to give the pigs away outright than to keep them on a starvation diet. A stunted pig will seldom if ever develop growing power. The fall pig must have warm, dry quarters, and unless the pigs are kept warm it will be found about impossible to induce any growth. When the little pigs are exposed to cold it takes all the food they can consume to keep warm.

FILLED ALL REQUIREMENTS.

She Wanted a Real Sensible Book and She Took Robinson Crusoe.

The trials of librarians in city libraries have often been cited; those of the guardians of small country libraries are of a different character, but require perhaps the exercise of even greater patience, says Youth's Companion.

"Ma wants you should pick her out a book," said a freckle-faced girl to the bright young woman in charge of the free library of a New England village; "and she don't want a serious one, she says, nor she don't want a love story, without it's founded on fact. Nor of course, she don't want anything she's ever read before."

The librarian tapped her pencil thoughtfully on the desk, without a trace of despair which a chance listener to this dialogue expected to see on her face.

"Nor she don't want anything that's chopped up into short stories, she says," continued the girl, bent on the librarian's further enlightenment, "and she wants consider'ble going on, and a lot of pictures, ma does. And she told me partic'lar to say she didn't want no dil'ec' stories; she says she knows well enough how folks in the country talk."

Still the librarian thoughfully tapped her pencil, apparently waiting for further instructions.

"She wants a real sensible book, the kind grandma likes and I like, too," volunteered "ma's" emissary; then suddenly she leaned over the librarian. "Say," she whispered, hoarsely, "if there's one of the Robinson Cruzo books in, ma said you'd better gimme that."

"Certainly," said the librarian, pleasantly, and a moment later the well-thumbed copy of the famous adventures had changed hands, and the happy possessor of it departed wreathed in smiles.

A Wonderful Old Lady.

Lord Rosebery's mother, the duchess of Cleveland, is a wonderful old lady. Though she is in her eighty-first year she is full of energy and is a delightful companion. The London King mentions, as an illustration of her activity, that she did not indulge her love for travel until she was over 70 years of age, and since then she has made many a journey, including a tour to India, the West Indies and British South Africa. The duchess was married to the late duke of Cleveland in 1854, three years after the death of Lord Dalmeny, Lord Rosebery's father.

Diseases of the Kidneys

will stand no trifling because no disease is so deceptive and none more fatal. Statistics show that more people die from Kidney Diseases than any other disease.

U. S. SENATOR DAVIS DIES FROM KIDNEY DISEASE.

Senator Davis made a prolonged and gallant fight with disease.

The trouble, of which the kidney affection was the fatal outcome, first appeared about Sept. 20.

* * * * * * * *

Trouble Stealthily Encroached.

The trouble had, however, steathily encroached upon a vital organ, and on Nov. 11 examination of the urine proved the presence of inflammation of the kidneys.

Both acute nephritis and diabetes made their appearance, and Dr. Murphy, of Chicago, was summoned. He agreed with Doctors Stone and Lankester as to the presence of these serious ailments in acute form, and, while not making any public statement, he made known privately to some of Senator Davis' business associates his opinion that the case was hopeless.

* * * * * * * *

To those, however, who were familiar with the symptoms of acute kidney troubles the bulletins held ominous information, the rapid respiration, fluctuating pulse, delirium and approaching coma telling the story of death's nearness.

—St. Paul Dispatch.

Is This What Ails You?

Does your back ache?
Do you have scanty flow of urine?
Do you have frequent severe headaches?
Do you urinate too frequently either day or night.
Have you sand, gravel, brick dust or white mucous in your urine?
Have you dark or bloody looking urine which scalds when voiding?
Have you dark circles around the eyes, puffiness under the eyes, or bloated appearance of the face in the morning?

Your Kidneys are Sick

AND HERE IS WHERE YOUR DANGER LIES:

Kidney Disease does not make itself felt until it has secured a firm hold on your system.

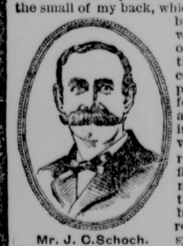
Morrow's Kid-ne-oids are made for Kidney Diseases and that they cure Kidney Diseases can be attested by a "cloud of living witnesses," three of which give voluntary testimony below:



Mr. J. C. Schoch.

Mr. J. C. Schoch, of DuBois, Pa., convinced beyond the shadow of a doubt that Morrow's Kid-ne-olds cure kidney troubles promptly and to stay cured.

"For about a year I had a dull, heavy pain in the small of my back, which would be attended by a sharp, stining pain when lifting or stooping over. On account of the pain in my back I could not sleep and get proper rest, and would feel dull and tired when arising in the morning instead of fresh and vigorous. When Morrow's Kid-ne-olds were first advertised I did not have much faith in their curative qualities, but after seeing them recommended to relieve symptoms like my own, I procured some at Vosburg's drug store, and took them according to directions. In a few days the pain in my back stopped. The Kid-ne-olds have done away with that dull, tired feeling and I am enjoying better health than I have for years." Mr. Schoch, lives at 117 Olive Ave., DuBoise, Pa. and is always glad to say a good word for that peerless kidney remedy—Kid-ne-olds.

Mrs. Gold Campman.

Mrs. Gold Campman 48 River St., Sharon, Pa., graphically describes her condition before and after she used Morrow's Kid-ne-olds, hoping by so doing she will help some other woman to get rid of the debilitating backaches so common to the female sex.

Sharon, Pa., Nov. 8, 1900. John Morrow & Co. Dear Sirs:—"I take pleasure in recommending your medicine to the public in the hope that it may benefit others as it has me. Three years ago in March I was attacked with a severe fever which left me in a miserable, weak condition. About one year ago, after my kidneys became affected, the pain in my back was so bad I could not sit up or lie down. I saw Morrow's Kid-ne-olds highly recommended and procured a box and took them according to directions, which resulted in a cure. I have taken in all three boxes and consider the medicine so good for kidney troubles that I will take no other." Yours truly, Mrs. Gold Campman.

Graphic interview given our reporter by Mrs. D. S. Sterner, of Altoona, Pa., who suffered for years with kidney troubles.

Mrs. D. S. Sterner.

"I suffered several years with kidney trouble and did considerable doctoring, even going to the hospital for a time, but it seemed that my disease was incurable. My suffering was terrible, especially with my back. I saw Morrow's Kid-ne-olds advertised and recommended so highly by other persons whose symptoms were similar to my own that I decided to try them. I began to improve in two or three days after I commenced to take them, and continued to improve until the pain in my back has all disappeared. I have felt like a new person since taking Kid-ne-olds and am only too glad to be able to recommend such a valuable medicine." Mrs. Sterner resides at 1615 7th Ave., Altoona, Pa.

SOME MEN GROW ON TREES.

This Is the Belief of an Indian and Some Other Tribes.

The Sioux Indians still share with the old Aryan and Semitic tribes in the belief that there are trees that bring forth human beings and others that bear various portions of the human body, and in the fourteenth century an Italian traveler, on arriving at Malabar, was told by the natives that the country abounded with a tree that bore men and women. The latter were attached to the limbs by the nether extremities and were full formed when the wind blew, but when the wind died out they soon withered. These specimens of humanity reached the length or height of three feet.

In the first book of the Mahadharata mention is made of forms of dwarfs that were to be found on a large fig tree. The Arabs are still strong in the belief that somewhere in the southern ocean there is a tree that bears a nut that resembles the face of a man and when in its fullness the mouth opens and gives voice to the cry: "Wak! Wak!" The Chinese reverse the order of things and, instead of believing that the trees give birth to men, claim that in the beginning the herbs and grass sprang from the hair of the human family. They have preserved the tradition, too, that somewhere within the borders of the beautiful Flowery Kingdom there is a wonderful lake by whose margin grew trees whose leaves developed into birds and also that, if a jar be broken on the waters, birds of the most brilliant plumage will at once arise from the pieces and fly off.

In central India there is a tribe called Khatties that claim to have their origin from a stick of wood. When the five sons of Pandu, the heroes whose exploits are told in the Mahadharata, had become simple tenders of sheep, Karna, their illegitimate brother, wishing to deprive them of their last resource, prayed to be gods to assist him. He struck the earth with his staff, which opened, and from it sprang a man who was called Khat, meaning begotten of wood, and by this name have his descendants ever since been known.—St. Louis Republic.

LINCOLN WAS GRACIOUS.

Invited the Theater Usher to a Seat In His Box.

"I never was much of a Republican," said a gentleman who was born and reared in Washington, "but I loved Abraham Lincoln. He was one of the most lovable men I ever met. I was an usher at the National theater, and about two weeks before the assassination John Wilkes Booth and Susan Denin were playing there. Mrs. Lincoln having expressed a desire to see them in 'Romeo and Juliet,' I was sent to the president's house to say that a box had been reserved. In the evening, Mrs. Lincoln being indisposed, the president and little Tad Lincoln came, and I showed them to the box.

"As Tad entered he turned and said, 'Come in, Lew.' 'Oh, no,' I replied; 'that would not be right.' Tad then turned to his father and said, 'Pap, you have no objection to Lew coming in?' Mr. Lincoln, with a smile and motioning me to a seat, replied: 'No, Tad; certainly not for any of your friends. We will be glad to have your company.'

"I told Tad that my business would not allow me the privilege, and, thanking both father and son, I returned to my duties with a light heart and with an admiration for the president I have felt for but few men, and since that incident I have often recalled it and expressed my sorrow that he met with a death so untimely."—Washington Star.

Jupiter Warmer Than the Earth.

The gigantic mass of Jupiter has a much larger warmth than that of the earth. It is the result of the molecular movement produced by the compression of the strata and must be greater the more powerful the masses, and hence the larger the pressure of the strata is. Jupiter surpasses the earth in point of mass 307 times, and for this reason the inner temperature or individual warmth of the planet is probably high enough to evaporate the water upon the surface quickly, so that water vapor forms the principal substance of the atmosphere of Jupiter. Water vapor is an excellent reflector and readily accounts for the bright radiation of light emitted by the planet.—Professor Hughes in Chicago Tribune.

Awkward Compliment.

There is such a thing as being too persistently complimentary. A candid and well meaning professor who had witnessed the performance of a little play in a private house in which his hostess had taken the leading part met the lady as she came from behind the curtain.

"Madam," he said, rushing up to her, "you played excellently. That part fits you to perfection."

"Oh, no, professor," said the lady modestly. "A young and pretty woman is needed for that part."

"But, madam," persisted the professor, "you have positively proved the contrary!"—Pearson's Weekly.

In the Dumps.

There was once upon a time an Egyptian king, so it is said, who built a pyramid and died of melancholy. His name was Dumops, yet there are probably few persons who know that they are perpetuating the memory of his tragic history when they remark that they are "in the dumps."

Extraordinary Temerity.

"I told that Boston girl I didn't like Emerson."

"Was she displeased?"

"Displeased? She got nearly as mad as she did when I said that beans could be baked without salt pork."—Chicago Record.

DISFRANCHISEMENT UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

An Amendment to the Organic Law Necessary Before Action Can Be Taken.

Should the Democrats in Maryland conclude to have an extra session of the legislature and succeed in passing a law which would result in the disfranchisement of the illiterate voters, they may run up against a constitutional objection which may invalidate the act and probably result in the National Congress taking a hand.

Representative Mudd, who has given the subject careful study and is understood to reflect the views of the ablest constitutional lawyers in Congress, gave your correspondent recently a comprehensive statement which presents very good reasons why the proposed law will not be effective.

"As to the expediency and wisdom of the calling of an extra session of the legislature by the governor for the purpose of restricting suffrage," said he, "I have nothing to say. I am not adviser to the Democratic party in Maryland. If I were I should be inclined to suggest that such a course would be unwise and impolitic from its standpoint. The restriction of suffrage by imposing what is tantamount to an educational qualification might result in a Democratic candidate for the Senate obtaining a certificate of election; it would not necessarily seat him in the Senate, if the Republican majority of that body should be of the opinion, as is almost every lawyer of any standing down here, that such action by the legislature would be unconstitutional.

"In this connection it might be well to state that wherever an educational qualification has been prescribed—and it has been done in quite a number of states, both North and South—it has been done by an amendment to the constitution of the state or by constitutional convention. To say that no man can vote who cannot mark his own tickets does not prescribe an educational qualification is a pretense of the worst sort. When you say that no man shall vote who cannot read the names of the candidates he votes for you prescribe an educational qualification. No lawyer of prominence in any state of the United States has ever yet found who thought that such legislation could be had without constitutional warrant therefor.

"The disposition of those Democrats in Maryland who seem to favor the calling of an extra session of the legislature to restrict suffrage in the interests of the Democratic party is in marked contrast to the spirit manifested by the Republican majority in Congress. It was, perhaps, as much due to the action of the Maryland delegation in Congress as to anything else that action looking to the reduction of representation in several states of the Union was not had, or was at least deferred.

"I have seen a statement to the effect that if the provision of the Fourteenth amendment, providing for the reduction of representation in Congress because of the restriction of suffrage for other cause than crime or participation in rebellion, were invoked, Massachusetts would lose about one half of her representatives and that other Northern states would suffer similiar loss.

"Any statement of that kind, by whomsoever made, is in reckless disregard of the truth, as the slightest investigation would show. The total percentage of illiterates in Massachusetts—the highest claimed by anybody—is about 7 per cent. of the population. That includes, I am informed, as well persons non-naturalized as those who are citizens. The 14th amendment cannot affect anyone except citizens of the United States, and the persons who are not naturalized, who are denied suffrage, cannot figure at all as a basis or a part of a basis for reduction of representation under the 14th amendment. The actual percentage of illiterates is, I understand, of native people and persons naturalized, not more than 3 or 4 per cent., not enough to lose a single representative.

"The fact is that in no state which has passed laws restrictive of the franchise would there be a loss of a single representative if the provisions of the 14th amendment referred to were put into effect, with the exception of North Carolina, South Carolina, Mississippi and Louisiana.

"The general feeling upon the part of the Republican membership of Congress here is that where there has been a feeling of real bona fide necessity to restrict suffrage because of widespread and hurtful illitracy, the constitutional power to reduce representation should not be invoked; yes, I will go further than that, and say that where there has been felt such a necessity to restrict suffrage because of what our Southern friends call 'negro domination,' as exemplified in states where the colored people have a decided majority, by a complete assumption of government upon their part over the whites, going to the extent, as it is claimed, of a destruction or serious impairment of Anglo-Saxon civilization—there is a disposition not to invoke the constitutional power because of such a condition.

"On the other hand, should this restriction of suffrage go on and extend to states where there is no such fear of negro domination, where, as in Maryland, the percentage of the colored population to the white is about only one-fifth of the whole, and where, therefore, such restriction is a mere partisan device to advance the interests of certain political regimes, or to obtain advantage by one party over another, the feeling, if I judge aright, is emphatic to the effect that Congress would be called upon and justified in interfering, either to prevent such movements or to give to them their natural and constitutional consequence of a reduction of representative power proportionate to their own reduction of voting power.

"The feeling here among the Republican members is that if this new century is to be marked by any conspicuous readvent of sectional and partisan legislation, that it would be better that such a movement did not originate with the Republican party, but to give the Democratic party a monopoly of it; and then, if in the end the Federal government, out of an enforced sense of respect to constitutional provisions, should feel called upon to step in and to restore the disturbed equilibrium of voting or representative power of its different sections, the people will take note of the occasion for such action and place the responsibility where it belongs."

As Mr. Mudd speaks with authority it behooves the Democrats in Maryland to consider well before acting.

To think of its raining to-day. Dear! dear!

"There were so many things I wanted to do.
There's my brand-new stilts that I haven't tried,
And my big velocipede, red and blue,
That I never shall get a chance to ride.

"If only it hadn't rained! Oh, dear!
It's perfectly dreadful. I don't know how
I'm going to stand it, poked up here.
It's just too horribly mean—so now!"

"Well, well, it's raining!" says little Sue,
With her sunny smile, no whit less gay;
"And now let me think what I can do,
For I certainly can't go out to-day.

"There's the beds to make and the floors to sweep.
I'm going to help. I can, I know.
There's the darling baby to rock to sleep.
There's the blocks of my patchwork quilt to sew.

"Oh, I'm sure there are plenty of things to be done,
And I'm sure, too, it's the nicest way,
For I shan't have a minute of time—not one—
To be sorry that it's a rainy day."

HEROIC LIFE SAVERS.

A Deed of Daring and Devotion Which Deserves to Be Immortalized in Prose and Verse.

In St. Nicholas Lieut. Worth G. Ross, United States revenue cutter service, tells of an extraordinary rescue on the shore of Lake Superior. A schooner and steam barge were stranded at Marquette, and after making heroic efforts all day long to succor the survivors, the would-be rescuers telegraphed to a regular life-saving crew. Some one proposed this as a last resort. It seemed like a forlorn hope, for the nearest station was then at Ship canal, 110 miles distant! However, the chance, meager as it looked, was considered worth taking, and arrangements were at once begun to bring the life-boat and its crew. A telegram, which had to be carried six miles by a tug, was sent to the keeper of the station, telling of the peril of the sailors. The managers of the railroad offered a special train to bring the surfmen and their apparatus to Marquette. As soon as the keeper received the message, he and his men, with the life-boat, wreck-gun, and all necessary appurtenances, were taken on the tug, which steamed as fast as she could to Houghton, where was waiting a train consisting of an engine, a passenger coach and two flat cars. It took the life-savers but a short time, with the helpers who volunteered, to put the apparatus on board the cars and secure it, after which the train sped swiftly out into the night on her merciful errand, followed by the resounding cheers of the crowd of persons who had come upon the scene.

Perhaps no life-saving crew had ever before started out on a journey so exceptional. They were stirred to the noblest impulses by its intense significance, and had determined among themselves to do or die in the perilous task before them. Although the track was heavy with snow, the powerful locomotive raced on at high speed through the driving tempest, at times almost reaching the rate of a mile a minute. The coating of snow made the engine and cars look strangely grotesque as the train pulled into the railway station at Marquette, after a run (with its necessary stoppages) that had never been matched under the circumstances. It was nearly midnight when the crowd of expectant and cheering men helped the life-savers and their appliances from the cars. Wagons and sleighs had been provided to take them to the lake, and also a plentiful supply of food for the half-starved sailors when they should be brought ashore.

After a hard trip along the dark beach, in the wash of the surf, which was thick with driftwood, the station-crew finally arrived abreast of the vessels. A throng of people were there before them, anxiously awaiting their arrival. The bonfires which had been kept burning gave needed light to the workers, and, in view of the great seas that were tumbling in, it was thought best to attempt first a rescue by means of lines. One was fired over the steam-barge amidships, but it appears that the sailors were prevented from getting it by the rush of breakers across the decks. The keeper now decided to use the boat. There were two reefs to pass, over which the waves were dashing with frightful fury. The lifeboat crossed the first one, shipping three seas on the way; but, the rudder becoming disabled, the men were obliged to return. While repairs were being made another shot was fired over the vessel, but no one reached the line.

At daybreak the boat was again launched, and by strenuous and undaunted exertions the oarsmen held to their work, succeeded in crossing the reefs, alive with foaming breakers, and got alongside the barge. By this time the lifeboat was sheathed with ice, the seas having frozen on the planking, and being thus weighted down, it was considered prudent to take in only nine of the vessel's crew. With these a start was made for the shore, which was regained after another valiant and perilous passage.

Two more trips were made to the wrecks by the life-savers, their boat at times being flooded and partially beaten back, and once nearly thrown end over end on the reef. The men themselves were drenched with icy water, which made their work much harder to endure.

Their heroic and indomitable efforts were crowned with full success, every one on the two vessels, 24 in all, being saved. Many of these were almost frozen and nearly starved, and were immediately taken by the citizens to the fires on the beach where there was food.

I cannot do better here than to quote from the report of the general superintendent of the life-saving service touching this memorable achievement of the Ship canal crew: "To have come rushing through the night and tempest over so many snowy leagues to the rescue of a group of despairing sailors, and then, with hearts greater than danger, to have gone out again and again through the dreadful breakers and brought every man ashore, was a feat so boldly adventurous that the current accounts of it in the public journals roused, at the time, the whole lake region to intense enthusiasm, and sent thrills of sympathy and admiration through the country."

WITCH HAZEL SEEDS.

They Are Expelled from the Pods with a Force and Sound of Fairy Artillery.

What boy or girl who has ever gone nutting in October has not been arrested among the underbrush by a sound of fairy artillery, or even been hit on the cheek by a solid piece of ammunition in the shape of a glossy black seed? asks Dora Read Goodale in St. Nicholas. Looking about for your assailant, you see only a tall shrub, whose leafless branches are hung with fringes of gold, and wonder, perhaps, why those delicate blossoms mature at a time when most wild flowers have finished their season's work—when, as Bryant says:

"Frosts and shortening days portend
The aged Year is near his end."

But look closer among those tardy gold fringes and you will see clusters of oddly shaped pods, some empty and yawning like miniature cannon, others still loaded and ready to fire their handsome little missiles when the right moment arrives.

This curious shrub, which takes a whole year to mature its fruit, is the witch-hazel, or hamamelis—the same that we know as a bottle-genius ready to cure our cuts and bruises. To see how the shooting is done, it is worth while to bring a branch of the seed-pods indoors and to study their mechanism more at leisure. As the fruit ripens the outer coat of the pod separates from the inner, and this outer shell splits down from the top, while the elastic inner covering also splits, and its edges press on the seeds. This pressure in time expels the hard little nut in much the same way that an apple-seed (almost identical in shape) is "fired" by the pressure of a boy's thumb and forefinger.

POP GO THE LITTLE SEEDS.

The witch-hazel always impresses me as a very spirited plant, full of will power and energy, and determined that its children shall have a good start in the world. It is said that its seeds are sometimes thrown a distance of 45 feet, and, while I cannot vouch for this, I do know that they will strike one very forcibly at a distance of 12 or 15. By this ingenious contrivance the young witch-hazel folks begin life at a distance, where the ground has been neither shaded nor exhausted by the parent bush.

The witch-hazel is common over all eastern America, and any young naturalist may see it sowing its crops or lighting the woods with its elfin smile as late as Thanksgiving day.

New Names for the Zones.

"How many zones have we, Willie?" asked the teacher of a pupil in the junior class. "Four," was the reply. "Well, then, name the four," said the teacher. "The frigerated, the horrid, the temperance and the intemperance," answered the little fellow.

GOOD LAND ROLLER.

What an Ingenious Man Can Do with a Couple of Old Mowing Machine Wheels.

To make this roller, take two old mowing machine wheels and connect them by a one and one-half inch iron axle, as olng as roller is to be wide. Fit 2x3-inch scantlings round rims of the wheels, and hold by means of a band of wagon tire directly over each wheel, as shown in the accompanying cut, which shows one end of the roller. It is a good plan to have at least four of the scantlings bolted to rims by small bolts, holes being drilled in rims for this purpose. Make a frame of 2x4-inch material to set roller in, fit tongue or shafts to front and attach an old mowing machine seat to rear piece of frame. The roller should not be made too wide, unless four wheels are used, and the roller made in two sections. If made about four feet wide it might make a good one-horse roller.—J. G. Allshouse, in Ohio Farmer.

SOIL FOR POTATOES.

The Early Varieties Require Loamy Ground and the Most Perfect Drainage Possible.

A deep, loamy, warm, fertile soil is preferred. In the absence of such requisites the grower should choose one that nearest fills the description. A loamy soil, overlying a porous clay subsoil, is better than the same soil over a gravel or sand bed. Light soils, that is, such as are easily moved by the plow or less difficult to cultivate and more conducive to an early harvest than are heavy, compact soils. No matter what the character of the soil—light or heavy, poor or rich in necessary plant food—thorough drainage is essential to the best success with Irish potatoes. Shortly after a continued, heavy rainfall dig a hole in the ground about 15 inches deep. The distance to which water will rise in this hole will show the distance below the surface of the ground beyond which the roots of plants will be as effectually submerged in water as if lowered beneath the surface in a tub filled with the same liquid. If the water level is gradually lowered, so that within 24 to 36 hours after rain has ceased no water stands over the bottom of the hole, no artificial drainage is needed. If, on the other hand, water sinks much more slowly, open surface drains, properly placed, should remedy the trouble. A properly drained soil warms quicker in the spring, retains water necessary for the development of plants longer, admits more air and gives far better results from plant food already in the soil, to say nothing of that added in fertilizers, than does a poorly drained soil.—Farmers' Review.

TIMELY DAIRY NOTES.

Silage, and especially good corn silage, when compared with dry corn fodder or other feeding stuff, produces results so satisfactory as to surprise the chemist and which chemistry cannot explain.

A silo or two, well built, but not too large or too expensive, are convenient and economical, on most farms, to save crops which at times might otherwise be lost, if not to preserve some crops specially grown for silage.

A good grade butter cow will make more butter from a certain amount of feed than a common cow will and it is certainly reasonable that the more butter or milk secured from a given amount of feed the better the opportunity for profit.

With butter as with other products of the farm appearance is an important factor. On this account with a good quality of butter it will be found a good plan to use parchment paper with which to wrap the prints as rolls rather than cloths. The paper now can be secured so cheaply that all considered it will be found most economical.—Rural World.

New Berry from England.

From London comes the report of a new fruit shown for the first time at a recent meeting of the Royal Horticultural society. It is called the Mahdi and is a hybrid between the raspberry and blackberry, its seed parent being the Belle de Fontenay, a very large red raspberry of European origin. The Mahdi has very much the habit of the blackberry, but its fruit resembles to some extent the dewberry. There is the same bloom, but the number of fruitlets is greater. Most important is the time of fruiting, for it comes into bearing as the raspberries are failing and before the blackberries are ripe. The Mahdi is very prolific, and has considerable claim to be a decorative plant. The plants have not yet been placed upon the market.—American Agriculturist.

DRUNKEN MAN IN CHURCH.

Preacher Puts a Drunkard Into His Pulpit as a Horrible Example.

There was a dramatic scene at the Presbyterian church in Kokomo, Ind., the other night, where a revival is in progress, conducted by Evangelist Merton Smith, of Chicago. On a front seat near the pulpit sat a drunken saloon porter, who had wandered in the place in a dazed condition. The preacher was waxing loud and eloquent on the temperance question, when the intoxicated man arose and in a stentorian tone denounced him as a scoundrel and a liar. A number of women fainted. "Don't take him out!" exclaimed Evangelist Smith, as the janitor pushed the man towards the door. "It is not the man, but the liquor in him, that speaks. He is no worse than I was once." With the sot standing by his side in the pulpit the minister continued his discourse, with the living subject for a horrible example. After the outburst the man repented and wept. It was a touching scene, and there were few dry eyes in the house.

CLOSENESS PERSONIFIED.

Dreamed He Had to Pay a Dollar for a Cab and Was Afraid to Go to Sleep Again.

There's a good story told of a young fellow here noted for his closeness. He went to spend the night with a friend. During the entire night he betrayed much restlessness, which kept the host wide awake, and finally the slumberer betrayed signs of violent emotion. "He's going to have a nightmare," said the friend, "but he always grimbles so when you wake him up that I hate to disturb him." He waited awhile longer, sitting up in bed staring at the miserable sleeper, and, finally becoming alarmed, he roused him. He sprang up in bed, glared wildly around and said: "Where am I? I don't see the storm?"

"Why, here in my room," said his host, soothingly; "you remember you stayed all night with me? I beg your pardon for waking you up, but you carried on so I had to."

"Beg your pardon," gasped the guest. "I shall never be grateful enough to you. I dreamed I was out with Miss Bud and a terrible storm came up, and my shoes were new, and I was just ordering a coupe for two when you roused me. Old boy, you have saved me a dollar."

And the host says he was actually afraid to go to sleep again that night for fear the coupe would come, says the Louisville Times.

VICE REWARDED.

The Oracular Passenger Gives the Conductor a Tip and Gets Left Himself.

"The man who gave me that," said the conductor to the only passenger in the car, "must have thought I was a chump."

The passenger examined the lead five-cent piece with a smile, says Puck.

"You're stuck," he said, oracularly. "Unless," he added, unscrupulously, "you can pass it off."

"I wouldn't do that," returned the conductor, polishing the bogus coin on his coat sleeve. "Besides, no one would take it.

"Not alone, but you might slip it among two or three good ones," suggested the passenger.

The conductor shook his head virtuously, as the car began to fill up.

An hour later the ex-passenger fished up some small change to buy a cigar, and the first thing he saw was a lead five-cent piece.

"I gave him a quarter," he mused, "and he gave me four nickels in change. The man," he added, still musing, "who gave me that, must have thought I was a chump."

Celebrated Oculists Fail

To relieve many cases that Palmer's Lotion has permanently cured. Some time ago Mr. V. M. Green, of Huntington, West Virginia, wrote: "After trying the most celebrated oculists of Boston, Albany and New York City, for Granulated Eyelids, with no success, a few applications of Palmer's Lotion relieved the inflammation and its use has effected a permanent cure." This Lotion will also be found valuable in curing Pimples, Red Spots or any eruptions on the skin and is particularly efficacious if used in connection with Lotion Soap. If you can't find them at your druggist's send to Solon Palmer, 374 Pearl Street, New York City, for samples of Palmer's Lotion and Lotion Soap.

JAS. W. WHITE,
District No. 14. Oakland.

COLONEL M. S. Quay was elected United States Senator Tuesday by the Pennsylvania legislature at Harrisburg.

The House and Senate voted separately at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and Mr. Quay received a majority vote in each body.

LAST week's Journal wants to know how "the taxpayers of Garrett county relish the idea of paying $850 for half the county publishing when they are only paying $165 for the other half."

Why not make the question general, Mr. Journal, by adding: How do they relish the idea of paying the Journal an advance of more than 300 per cent. over the price paid last year for the same work?

Of course, you did not intend to practice any deception upon your readers when you penned that sentence, did you Mr. Journal man? You believe in making everything clear, according to your own ideas. If we remember correctly you made the assertion some time ago that the money received for the publishing last year ($50) was sufficient and that money could be made at it. Of course this has slipped your memory.

America's Progress.

The progress that has been made in this country during the nineteenth century is emphasized by the taunts that were made at this country's expense in earlier days when the United States had not made the impress on civilization that is now universally recognized.

Sydney Smith wrote in the Edinburg Review, in 1820:

"In the four quarters of the globe, who reads an American book? Or goes to an American play? Or looks at an American picture or statue? What does the world yet owe to American physicians or surgeons? What new substances have their chemists discovered or what old ones have they analyzed? What new constellations have been discovered by the telescopes of America? What have they done in mathematics? Who drinks out of American glass? Or eats from American plates? Or wears American coats or gowns? Or sleeps in American blankets?"

How different all is now. American authors are foremost in literature, American inventors have made more abundant contributions to the conveniencies of mankind than those of all other nationalities, and America leads the world in manufacturing supremacy.

Good Roads.

How important good roads are comparatively few persons realize. The effects of good roads upon any country district is almost to be compared with the effect of a good circulation of the blood upon the vigor and heartiness of the human body. It is all-pervading; it is felt every day and every hour. Roads poorly built, or kept in a slovenly state; roads that are everlastingly being repaired, but are never in repair; roads that are no sooner free from mud than they become intolerable with dust; roads that are full of ruts and stones and holes—all this is not only injurious directly through the wear and tear of wagons and the personal inconvenience of travel. Indeed, great as are these evils, they are by far the least part of the injury; for the habit of seeing and using such roads constantly, and of becoming contented with them or impotently grumbling about them, insidiously effects the whole tone of life, the habits of thought and action of the people of any country district. People ought to be made to feel what is the actual fact—that the possession of thoroughly good roads is the most vital of all the needs of any county.

Oakland Schools.

ED. REPUBLICAN:—I wish a very small space in your valuable paper to say a word in reply to an article published in the Journal signed "Citizen." I regret very much to feel compelled to do so, and shall notice only such portions as refer directly to our schools. I shall take it for granted that "Citizen" is all he claims to be—that he has an interest in the public schools; an interest that he will maintain and defend. Also that his hope for the "betterment of the public schools of Oakland," especially, will be realized.

The statement that a teacher gave a grade in his charge but one recitation in a week is without foundation. "Citizen" must have picked up this false information by the wayside. I am sure he did not get it through the proper channel, viz., by a personal visitation of the schools.

It does seem to me that the proper thing for "Citizen" to have done, upon getting such information, would have been to have called personally upon the principal and stated the matter and learned the facts, instead of "rushing into print." Suppose he had found this wrong to have been perpetrated, the proper step would have been to have called the attention of the school authorities to it—in other words, demanded an investigation.

I claim that in order for schools to be what they should be there must be what I term "co-operative unity."

Now, my friend, whoever you may be, can't you come out and tell us who you are? Come visit the schools, or do this—formulate the matter into charges and have done with it. I court the fullest investigation.

OLD LAND GRANTS.

Mr. Jacob Brown Writes of Patented Lands in Garrett County.

To the Editor of The Republican.

In the more early history of old Allegany county, especially that part of it which now forms Garrett county, a large number of extensive tracts of land were secured by various parties, mostly vacant lands, under patents upon common warrants. Prominent among these tracts was "Walnut Hills," about 4,000 acres, patented to Gen. John Swan, of Revolutionary distinction, about the beginning of the late century. "Yough Manor," about 10,000, patented to the same patriot about the year 1800. "Potomac Manor Resurveyed," for the same party in 1799, for 10,749 acres; "Emancipation" surveyed for Robert Oliver and James Cunningham in 1830, 7,137 acres; "Latent Worth," for same parties, 10,761 acres, and "Cheviott Dale," about the same time, for the same parties, about 15,000 acres. There were many other large tracts patented to various persons in olden times as well as in later years, but time and space will not allow a reference to them.

"Walnut Hills," situated in the north eastern part of Garrett county, merits special attention, on account of the foresight and judgment with which its original proprietor dealt with it. Originally it contained the finest forests of white pine timber in the State. Gen. Swan, or his heirs, had the whole tract surveyed and laid off into lots, numbered 1, 2, &c., of about 200 acres each, more or less, and in this way they were sold and conveyed to nearly as many purchasers. The first sale, lot No. 13, 236 acres, was made to John Durst, then a citizen of Pennsylvania, "Lightfoot John," as he was often called, in 1826. He built the first saw mill in about 1833 in Garrett county, except the one at Little Crossings, by Jas. Tomlinson. The former mill disappeared many years ago. And here it can be appropriately stated that the first steam saw mill in the same county was built on one of these tracts in 1837. All the other lots were sold and conveyed from time to time, but not in the order they were numbered. Wm. Frost got No. 1; Samuel Durst No. 2; Isadore McKinzie No. 3; Isaac Crow No. 4; Wm. Robinson No. 5; Eli Whetzell No. 6; D. Potter No. 7; David Potter No. 8; John Garlitz No. 9; B. Wilhelm No. 10; Meshack Frost and A. Beall No. 11, John Blocher No. 12; J. Durst No. 13; M. Durst and N. Beall No. 14; same parties No. 15; John Layman No. 16; Nelson Beall No. 17; S. Durst No. 18, J. Durst No. 19; M. S. Durst No. 20 and J. Durst No. 21. It is supposed none of the original purchasers of these lands now hold them. All passed into other hands. One of the present owners is Patrick Dorsey, who owns one, and his home is one of the most beautiful houses in the county, with a fine farm attached in excellent cultivation.

All, or nearly all these plats of land have been made into farms under fair cultivation and occupied by prosperous and respectable people. Scarcely a pine tree is left standing on these lands, but plenty of stumps. Some of the timber operators did well in times past, while others failed or had a hard struggle for livings. It is well known now that the present owners as farmers are in far better condition than when they relied upon timber and lumber for a livelihood. There are now upon this ancient tract, to say nothing of farms and kindred property, one thriving village, Avilton, with its stores, postoffice and shops; four churches: German Reform, Methodist, Catholic and German Baptist, with about as many school houses. One old time grist mill still alive. This region is known as Pea Ridge and New Germany, with quite a dense population of good, law-abiding citizens, numbering many hundreds.

With this example in view, it would at once be observed and remarked: Why were not more of these numerous manors of lands handled in like manner? Had such a course been generally pursued the county of Garrett would now have twice its present population. However, in a few years, all the timber, other than pine, will be exhausted, when the people will be forced to resort to the soil for an independent and bountiful living. Besides a good soil and unsurpassed climate capable of producing all the cereals, vegatables and fruits, the county has vast deposits of coal and other minerals almost untouched—only sufficient to show the article is there, and its development and wants near at hand.

Additional to the coal resources, there are now developments being made near the boundaries of Walnut Hill of the precious metals, particularly silver. It is estimated that, after further penetrations in the ores, silver will be found of paying richness. Still it is not certain by any means that this is the find of the old hunter, George Layman, over 65 years ago in that region of country, then an unbroken forest. His story or statement was this: That upon one of his hunting excursions for deer he came upon a rock or rocks that had the appearance of silver. He broke off some pieces of the rock with his little hunting axe and put them in his shot pouch, and brought them to Frostburg and showed them to Messrs. Jos. Dilley, Meshack Frost and Robt. McCulloh. They were favorably impressed with the specimens, and sent to Philadelphia and had them tested, when it was found to be rich silver ore. These respectable parties at once entered into a written agreement with Layman, but he was never able afterwards to find the precious spot, though often searched for. He died in Frostburg about the year 1862. All three of these reliable men told the writer all about the discovery, and they believed it to be a reality up to their deaths.

The oyster supper and entertainment held by the Deer Park Cornet Band in Laughlin Hall, Dec. 31st and Jan. 1st, was a decided success, socially and financially. The handsome oak wardrobe was won by Mr. W. H. Chadderton, and the band extend their thanks to all who contributed and assisted them in any way to make their entertainment a success. The band has always been willing to help at whatever entertainment has been in the town and when they get up an entertainment the public shows their appreciation by doing what they can for the band. One good turn deserves another, and while a number of the band have left town during the winter, the others are doing their best, and when the summer comes and the others come home, Deer Park will still have the best band in the county, and it will always be sure of all the assistence the town can give in whatever way it is needed.

MONDAY.

IT all depends upon what you want in a soap. If you require simply a dirt remover, almost any soap will do. But if you care at all about the thing which is to be washed, you must think twice before you act. Any soap will clean linens and muslins, but Ivory Soap leaves them as white as snow. Any soap will clean sheets and table cloths, but Ivory Soap leaves no coarse, strong odor. Try it once!

Theatre goers differ largely in taste. Some enjoy drama, some orchestral music, some band music, some are appealed to more strongly by specialties, songs, dances, etc. Others are reached through the eye, beautiful scenery, elaborate stage settings, elegant costumes, correct colorings and artistic groupings please them above all else. The attraction gathering together and presenting all these things in a first-class manner is the one that will please everybody. The Frank Davidson Company has done this very thing, and is reaping a harvest. They will be at the Opera House for three nights beginning Thursday evening, January 17 and the people of this city will be with them.

Getting Thin

is all right, if you are too fat; and all wrong, if too thin already.

Fat, enough for your habit, is healthy; a little more, or less, is no great harm. Too fat, consult a doctor; too thin, persistently thin, no matter what cause, take Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil.

There are many causes of getting too thin; they all come under these two heads: over-work and under-digestion.

Stop over-work, if you can; but, whether you can or not, take Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil, to balance yourself with your work. You can't live on it—true—but, by it, you can. There's a limit, however; you'll pay for it.

Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil is the readiest cure for "can't eat," unless it comes of your doing no work—you can't long be well and strong, without some sort of activity.

The genuine has this picture on it, and no other. If you have not tried it, send for a sample, its agreeable taste will surprise you.

B. & O. ORDERS 100 MORE ENGINES.

Total of 265 in a Year—May Spend $1,000,000 at Locust Point.

A dispatch from Philadelphia says: "The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company is in the market for 100 new locomotives. This order will be in addition to the 100 locomotives now being delivered to that company."

The ordering of more locomotives by the B. & O. R. R. is not a surprise to those familiar with the heavy and continuous increase in the business of the road. The new order will mean the expenditure of something like $1,500,000.

About a year ago the company ordered 65 new locomotives and before these were delivered a new order for 100 more was given. Deliveries of the last order are now being made. With the second hundred which the dispatch from Philadelphia states has been decided upon the company will have ordered 265 new locomotives within about a year. This is probably a record breaker in ordering equipment, as it means an aggregate expenditure of approximately $3,500,000 for locomotives alone. Some of these new engines are for the passenger service, which, like the freight business of the company, has been steadily increasing.

The company has under contract—on which deliveries are now being made—9,000 new cars, 500 flat cars and 6,000 steel coal cars. There are also under contract 25 new passenger coaches of the vestibuled modern type.

In all these contracts for cars represent an expenditure of nearly $8,000,000. This huge sum, added to the aggregate for locomotives, will make a total outlay on orders for equipment placed within a year in the neighborhood of $11,500,000.

This large sum is only a part of what has been expended for equipment alone since the receivership. Including the locomotives now being delivered and the new order just determined upon, about 500 engines will have been added to the property since that time. The number of new cars, not including those now under contract, which have been secured is over 30,000. Notwithstanding these additions the business of the road provides employment for all the new equipment and there is a demand for more.

Another heavy expenditure which is contemplated provides for further improvements of the Locust Point terminals. It is proposed to build five or six new piers for the use of ocean steamers. The new piers will be planned according to the latest ideas and will necessitate an expenditure of over $1,000,000.

This assures absolute scenic perfection to each of the plays presented, and will virtually make a new stage in our Opera House; all of the stock scenery being removed. Such a display of mechanical effect was never before attempted and is said to be alone worth seeing. The dates are Jan. 17, 18 and 19.

At the opening of bids by the Postoffice Department early during the winter it was found that no bid had been made for carrying the mails from Oakland to Accident and in consequence a readvertisement for the performance of the service has been posted at the postoffice in Oakland. The present contract price is $443, of which the carrier under the old system received $400 for his labor.

A man starts in with an advertisement and runs it a month or so, and then stops it for a while, and after a little time begins it again. Half the strength of the first ad is lost and it will take at least two months' extra advertising or the equivalent in space to connect the new ad with the old. The readers have had a chance to forget, and have forgotten at the expense of the advertiser. To a certain extent he must begin all over again. It would be cheaper to run a small ad during the intervening time.

The changeable weather of the past week or two has had the effect of making the roads in our county and the streets of Oakland in a well-nigh impassable condition. This condition of affairs, especially in Oakland, could be remedied in a great extent if the proper attention was paid to the drainage of the streets which have not yet been payed. The property owners themselves should endeavor to keep their platforms clear of mud which could be done without the expenditure of much labor.

Two classes of wild game especially annoying to farmers and the community in general—foxes and wild cats—are very numerous this season in the mountains about Grantsville and New Germany. A few days ago a hunting party consisting of Henry Turner, Daniel Dorsey, Thomas McKenzie and others started a large catamount from its lair on Meadow Mountain, about three miles north of the National Road. After a chase of several miles with six hounds the animal was killed by Mr. Turner. He was a monster, being over four feet in length and weighing something over sixty pounds. A smaller cat was shot about the same time by Calvin May and his brother.

Wm. Guisbert, of Friendsville, Md., since Xmas has been the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph S. Miller, the latter his sister. From here he returned to his old home in Maryland, but every few years returns to meet and greet his old friends.—Meyersdale Commercial.

Mr. and Mrs. R. Harry West and two children arrived in Oakland Saturday from Tecumseh, Nebraska, where they had been residing since Mr. West's return from Cape Nome. Oakland will be their future home. Mr. West expects to return to Cape Nome in the spring with other members of the Maryland Mining Company composed of Garrett countians.

An attempt was made on Sunday morning to blow the safe of the German Savings Bank at Cumberland, but the would-be robbers were put to flight by Officer Gross who opened fire upon them. About forty shots were exchanged. Two suspects have been arrested. It is thought that the officer wounded at least one of the men and that he is being hidden by friends in or near Cumberland.

A representative of the People's Telephone Company was here on Monday in communication with Mr. William A. Smith, president of the Garrett County Telephone Company, endeavoring to make arrangements with the home corporation for the extension of its lines east from Deer Park to a point near Piedmont where connection with the line of the People's company could be made which would give the subscribers of the local concern the advantages of long distance communication with but a slight increase in cost. Whether the terms are satisfactory to the parties concerned we are unable to state. If the extension should be made it would be a great convenience to the whole county, especially to business men who buy largely in the east.

"Raised" Money.

One day last week Frank Wheeler, B. & O. ticket agent in Oakland, accepted what apeared to be a $5 Treasury note in payment for a ticket purchased by a stranger. Upon closer examination later in the day and after the man who had given him the bill had left town an examination of the note revealed the fact that it was a $1 bill "raised" to a $5 bill. The manner of "doctoring" the note was clumsily done and the deception would have been noticed at a glance by an expert. The figure 1 had been erased in every case on the bill and in the two corners the figure 5 had been cut from an internal revenue stamp and pasted on.

Internal Revenue officials have been notified and placed in possession of the facts concerning the matter.

Murdered at Uniontown.

Arvilla Biggs, daughter of Mrs. Jno. D. Hartman, and the divorced wife of Oscar Notes, colored, formerly of Oakland, was murdered by her husband at Uniontown, Pa., on last Saturday morning. Biggs, after the commission of the crime, cut his own throat, and was found on Tuesday in a dying condition by officers who were searching for him. A letter left by Biggs directed that their household goods be shipped to Mrs. Hartman here, and gave as a reason for the crime that his wife was unfaithful to him.

GRIP.

Our Russian Friend Again With Suffering Humanity.

Every winter grip makes a circuit. The victims are numbered by the hundreds and every community feels the weight of the visitation. During its prevalence the victims have only the very poorest opinion of life and few of them think that it is worth living while they are under the spell of the Russian visitor who like many others from foreign countries makes itself very much at home with us.

This winter is no exception to the rule and the epidemic is now here. For several weeks it has been making it highly interesting for people of other towns but at last it has reached Oakland with its attendant train of evils in the shape of coughs, colds, sore eyes, headache, bone ache, rheumatism, neuralgia and other delightful cousins.

Every physician is busy with grip patients. From every hand comes complaints of the ravages of the epidemic. No one ever dies or very rarely does such a fate overtake the victim but everyone who has it feels that he will be unfortunate enough to survive the ordeal when death would be much more pleasant affording a blessed relief from the tortures inflicted by the malady.

It is claimed that the visitation this year is much milder than formerly and that we are becoming immune from the attack. It may be the case but few people who have the disease will admit this while the boiler factory is in full blast in their craniums.

The theory of those who make this claim of mildness is that we have had it so often that it is losing its power over us as in the case of the Persians who know nothing whatever of pure water or sanitation also know nothing whatever of typhoid fever. The germs which kill us are but meat to the stomach of a Persian.

For the past few days the weather conditions have been extremely favorable to the development of grip and it has florished like a green bay tree all over town.

Increase in House of Delegates.

Governor Smith will probably issue his proclamation early in February reapportioning the House of Delegates according to the new census. Under the Federal census of 1900 the House of Delegates of Maryland will be enlarged from 91 members to 98. This increase of seven is derived one each from the increased population of the following counties: Anne Arundel, Charles, Kent, Montgomery, Prince George's, St. Mary's, Washington.

Brakeman Stoned From Ambush.

Third Division Brakeman George H. Michael's, while standing on the top of a box car as his train was nearing McGuire's tunnel Sunday night was struck in the head with a large piece of ballast that was thrown from some bushes beside the track. He was knocked prostrate to the roof of the car. The supposition is that it was the act of some tramp, who had been ejected from a passing train.

Announcement.

Elsewhere in today's REPUBLICAN Mr. James W. White, the present efficent Register of Wills, announces his candidacy for the nomination of County Treasurer by the Republicans of Garrett county. Mr. White has always been a model public official and should he be named for County Treasurer he will no doubt be elected and fill the office acceptably.

J. C. Sherman, the veteran editor of the Vermontville (Mich.) Echo, has discovered the remarkable secret of keeping old people young. FIRST COAL MINED IN GARRETT.

Was Over a Century Ago—Development Now to Begin Aright.

The announcement in THE REPUBLICAN last week of the purchase of coal lands in the Potomac basin in Garrett county by the Elkins syndicate and the proposed plans for development brings out the fact that the first coal mined and used in Western Maryland or Pennsylvania was opened upon the old Brown farm near the Pennsylvania line, two miles south of Salisbury, in Garrett county.

This mine was opened over a century ago. Several years later the Thistle Mine, two miles west of Grantsville, near the national road, was opened and has been worked continuously for nearly a century. This is a four foot vein of clean merchantable coal. Negro mountain is underlaid with this vein, nearly every farmer working a drift mine.

In 1866 a company was formed in Allegany county to search for coal oil. They sank a well on Shade Run, one mile west of Grantsville in the Casselman valley. Inside of 140 feet from the surface they found three large veins of coal, the lowest 12 feet thick. The entire valley is underlaid with these veins.

On the North branch of the Casselman vein some years ago Mr. Bittinger faced or opened a vein of coal 7 ft thick. Last summer coal operators from George's Creek pronounced this coal of superior quality. The railroad under construction will be ready for traffic by April 1st, 1901. This road will open the Casselman valley, one of the fairest and most fertile in the state.

A vein of coal is said to have been discovered on the farm of James R. Bishop, just west of Oakland and adjoining the Bradley farm.

Henry Cross.

Henry Cross, who died at his home at Tunnelton, W. Va., was born at Eckhart in 1844, and, with the exception of the four years he served in the war, he had lived in the vicinity of Bloomington and along George's Creek valley. He was a miner by occupation and was well known to every old miner in the region. He was an old veteran and belonged to the Army of the Potomac, participating in some of the hardest fought battles of the war. In the battle of Gettysburg he was wounded in the left knee. He leaves four sons and three daughters, all of whom are married except Ernest, the youngest boy who is a volunteer soldier in the Philippines. His wife is very sick and was unable to attend the funeral.

Dropped Dead on the Street.

George Bucher, at one time mail carrier on the star route between Oakland and Accident, but later a soldier in one of the Maryland regiments during the Spanish-American war, dropped dead near the residence of D. E. Bolden on Second street in Oakland last Thursday night where he was found some time later by Register of Wills James W. White, who had a physician summoned and upon examination a death certificate was issued declaring the cause of death as being heart failure.

The body was removed from the street and taken to the undertaking rooms of Messrs. Bolden & Brown, where it was prepared for burial and on Saturday morning taken to Accident and interred.

Woman Appointed Jailor.

Grant is the only county in West Virginia and so far as known the only one in the United States, which has a woman for a jailor. The new sheriff of Grant county has just appointed as jailor Mrs. Anna MacDonald, a handsome widow, who will care for the prisoners and see that none of them escape from the jail in Maysville. Mrs. MacDonald is said to be nervy and cool and a good shot with a revolver. Those who know her think she will perform the duties of her office as well as a man.

MOTHER'S GRIDDLE CAKES.

When mother puts the griddle on
And rings the breakfast bell,
The way we boys our jackets don
And tumble down pell mell,
And get around the table quick
And ready to commence,
Just beats the biggest circus trick
You ever saw in tents.

At first we bow each little pate
While father says the grace;
Then mother sets a heaping plate
Of cakes at father's place.
Because he has his work to meet
We wait till he is through—
But it is hard to watch him eat
When we are hungry, too.

At last he's done, and says: "Good-by"
To mother with a kiss,
And then she makes the batter fly
And that hot griddle hiss,
And then we boys, who had to wait
For father, feast galore—
But fast as mother fills a plate
It's clean with yells for more.

I tell you what, those cakes are fine
With 'lasses on the top
And buttered over till they shine—
We don't know how to stop.
We stuff till mother cries: "Land sakes!
When will you boys be through?
To fill such appetites with cakes
Is more than I can do."

"Don't take the griddle off," cries Ned.
"I want some more," cries Will.
"I've only had nineteen," says Fred.
"I'm hungry yet," says Phil.
And so we keep our mother sweet
A trying might and main
To bake as fast as we can eat
And she just tries in vain.

At last she brings a heaping plate
With: "Boys! This must be all;
As long as I can stand and bake
For some and more you'll call.
I don't suppose you think that I
Am tired and hungry, too—
The batter bowl is nearly dry
And—well, I want a few."

That's just like ma. She never takes
A bit of breakfast till
Her boys, who love her griddled cakes,
Have had their royal fill,
And I don't blame her either, for
Not wanting cakes each day
And standing hungry on the floor
While we just stuff away.

The only trouble eating cakes
Is waiting for enough,
Because one person never bakes
As fast as four can stuff.
I'd have four persons bake for one,
And that one would be me,
And then no starving would be done
Between the plates, you see.

WOODMAN'S TRIP AFTER DUCKS

WOODMAN had been waiting with no little impatience ever since the duck season opened for some water to get into the marsh, so he could go and get some mallards. It was a very simple proposition, as he stated it to the office. The marsh was now all dried out and the birds wouldn't linger. There was nothing there but a few yaller-legs and redheads. It was understood that Woodman was in telegraphic communication with the marsh daily, and as soon as the water began to come in he would be off, and great would be the slaughter of the birds.

Herbert said he thought the game law ought to be amended so a man couldn't kill more than a dozen birds a day, just as it is in the matter of taking perch and pickerel, bass or wall-eyed pike; but Woodman said that would only affect pot hunters, and pot hunters wouldn't mind the law, anyway.

Nearly every day disreputable-looking characters would come into the office to talk to Woodman, and the manager regarded them with evident suspicion. They generally resembled thugs, and one was quite evidently a porch-climber. Sometimes they had dogs with them that acted as if they were away from home and fearful of bad treatment.

At length it rained and sleeted for a couple of days. The office shivered and hugged the radiators, but Woodman sat in his shirt sleeves with his window open two or three inches and his face wreathed in smiles. Bromley said something about rheumatism, and also made remarks about some people getting out on the roof, but Woodman heeded him not. He whistled tuneful bird calls as he read letters from the agents. All the others had taken their vacations in July and August, but Woodman had his coming.

One morning Woodman came down with his gun in a canvas case. He took it out and put it together, and the girl stenographers ran into the back room. He expatiated on the barrels, which were indeed of glassy smoothness, and looked quite regular and straight. He said they were double-and-twist and made of welded horseshoe nails. Bromley said they were probably made in Germany of welded fiddlesticks, but Bromley was promptly silenced. Woodman exhibited the action and the butternut stock, which was the finest ever put on a pair of barrels. The air-cushion was explained, and the weight and composition of the cartridges was dwelt upon at great length.

Woodman also divulged a secret, known only to a chosen few, of so splitting or manipulating a cartridge, by cutting it open and contracting the air chamber by the insertion of a bit of chewing gum or something of that sort, that the shot would carry a tremendous distance without scattering, to the inevitable and complete annihilation of any unfortunate bird that got in the way.

Bromley made notes of this to send to the game warden and to illustrate his next lecture before the Audubon society.

Then came the anxiously looked-for wire that the water was in the marsh and some ducks had been seen in the neighborhood of Brown's island, and Woodman announced that he would be lost to the world for the next two weeks.

His scheme was mapped out, in strict confidence, as follows: He and his companions would go down to Wilder's and there take a tent-raft and a canoe and float down the Kankakee, taking the birds as they went. When they got into a flock they would stay till they got them, and then go on at their leisure. In about ten days or so they would reach the confines of civilization at Shelby, laden with the spoils of the final day's shooting, and would leave the raft and boat and take a train for home. For companions he would have only Lon Hayman and Al Marks, the former a noted sportsman and the latter a native, a very child of the marsh. At Shelby they would have time for a couple of days with old Sandy, a noted tub-setter, and young Sandy, who had graduated into his father's profession as pusher. Woodman had no great liking for tubs, however. They were too confining, and, moreover, were against the game law. He could always get birds enough without using tubs. When he sat all day in a hole in the mud and ice to have a couple of men drive the ducks up to his gun he'd join the Pot-Hunters' union and cease to be a sportsman.

The Kankakee, as it finds its way through the nearly level marsh from English lake to the Des Plaines river in Will county, Ill., is a remarkable stream. It seems to follow a path along the watershed between the Laurentian and Ohio systems and is in constant doubt which way it shall go. The result is that every mile presents a succession of interrogation points. It twists and turns and doubles upon itself in a most extravagant fashion, so that a mile across lots is usually ten miles by river. But again, the curious part of it is that there are no cross lots. There are no paths through the Kankakee swamp. Except in the river it is neither land nor water, just swamp. The river itself has no bank—nothing but the fringe of ragged birch, maple and white-limbed sycamore, and patches of boggy prairie. No roads, houses, docks, bridges or other evidences of civilization are to be seen. It is as much a wilderness as when La Salle floated down the snag-obstructed stream two centuries ago.

While the boys were toasting themselves at the radiators in the stuffy office, or fighting sleetstorms to and from the cars, the fortunate Woodman was lazily floating down the Kankakee, with his commissariat and kitchen in his tent on the raft, and a swift skiff or canoe in which to steal quietly after the birds, his trusty gun ever in his hand and a wicked-looking knife in his belt. The knife, by the way, was extremely useful in cutting bacon. So Woodman was lost to the world for a space of 14 uneventful days, and the office boy drew pictures of Robinson Crusoe on the blotters.

The Saturday before his vacation was up the boys spent much time and artistic labor in decorating his corner. Ducks, as large as life and twice as natural, were cut out of wrapping paper by an advanced class of kindergarten scholars and pinned up on the wall and on the window shade. One fine flock was shown flying across the file cabinet, the top one just falling from a shot from the victorious hunter.

Monday morning came, and with it the hunter, somewhat the worse for wear. Despite a labored effort at jauntiness, his joints were evidently stiff, and his face had the color and texture of Texas beef.

"Ah;" he exclaimed, as he saw the display. "Ducks!" And the shade of sadness on his brow gave place to an expression of joy and satisfaction, as if he had found something that filled a long-felt want.

"How many did you get?"

"We didn't count them."

Now, when a hunter says he didn't count them his name is Ananias and the truth is not in him.

"We got a few," he went on, "but the marsh was dry and there weren't many there. We got enough, and I'm no hog for game, anyway."

"How was the weather?"

"Fine—for ducks. Rain, principally, and some snow. And a good deal of wind. The fact is, the marsh is played out. They have drained it to death, and the birds don't stop there any more. They have through tickets to the Red river, with no stopover allowed."

That afternoon one of the porch-climbers came in with a picturesque tale of 163. And Woodman said that all men are liars.

But the worst jar was when the light of the stenographers spoke up, in the honeyed voice she usually reserved for the telephone, and asked him if he had that mallard's wing he promised her. He was never the same man after that. —Chicago Daily Record.

AN ALL-AROUND GENIUS.

Maurice Thompson, the Indiana Author, Is at Last Obtaining National Recognition.

Maurice Thompson is a western writer whose name is not at all new to the reading public. He was born in Indiana on the 9th of September, 1844, but his early education was received in Georgia, to which state his father moved when Maurice was a child. In 1868 young Thompson returned to Indiana, and, having become a civil engineer, he took charge of the construction of a railroad. Civil engineering was not to his taste, and he gave it up for the law. Having married, he and his brother opened a law office in Crawfordsville, Ind., and for some years they practiced law with much success.

Maurice Thompson was versatile in his natural gifts, for he was successful not only as a lawyer, but also in politics and as a lecturer. Yet never has he struck quite so high a note as in his latest book, "Alice of Old Vincennes."

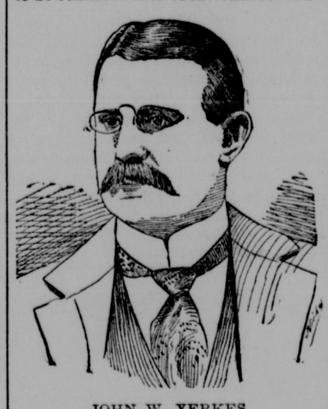
We have here a remarkably strong book dealing with the romantic history of the old French trading post and other incidents connected with the history of the American revolution. It will be a surprise to many intelligent readers to know that the town of Vincennes was founded nearly 200 years ago, and that it is the oldest town in the state of Indiana. The French founded a mission here in 1702, and they also erected a fort at a later period. Its first settlers were all French. In the year 1779 Gen. George Rogers Clarke attacked the fort and captured it from a British garrison. Gen. Clarke also captured the commandant of the fort, Gov. Hamilton, who was charged with the serious crime of inciting the Indians to attack the few settlements in the territory. There is not in all American revolutionary history a more striking incident than Gen. Clarke's capture of the fort. He had but 200 men, and the capture of the fort was a deed of wonderful daring and military skill. A year later, during the absence of Gen. Clarke, the fort was retaken by a detachment of British troops from Detroit.

With a force of but 175 men Gen. Clarke set out in the dead of a bitter winter to again take possession of the fort. For five days the intrepid general and his brave men marched through icy water up to their knees, but they had their reward in the recapture of the fort and the routing of the British.

YERKES' NEW OFFICE.

Leader of Kentucky Republicans Appointed United States Internal Revenue Commissioner.

The president has recently nominated John W. Yerkes, of Kentucky, to be commissioner of internal revenue.



JOHN W. YERKES.
(New United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue.)

He is one of the best known politicians of Kentucky. He is a native of Warminster township, Bucks county, Ky., where he first saw the light on April 10, 1854.

John W. Yerkes graduated from Danville college, Kentucky, in 1873, and three years later took the degree of master of arts. In 1877 he graduated from the University of Michigan with the degree of LL. B. After having practiced his profession at Danville, Ky., for a year he was appointed register in bankruptcy, and from 1877 to 1892 he was master in chancery. From 1891 to 1896 he was chairman of the republican state central committee, and in 1893 he was appointed state commissioner to the world's fair at Chicago. Two years later he went to Atlanta in a similar capacity. He has been a member of the republican national committee since 1896. He was appointed counsel for the Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific railroads in 1892, and in 1897 received the appointment of United States collector of internal revenue. He was nominated on the republican ticket for governor of Kentucky, but was defeated at the recent election by Gov. Beckham.

SAVED BY AN EAGLE.

Mr. Buckham Preserves a Dainty Bit of Indian Folklore.

How Waukewa, a Kind-Hearted Child of the Forest, Was Rescued Just in the Nick of Time by a Noble Bird.

In the story of "Waukewa's Eagle," in St. Nicholas, James Buckham preserves the legend of an Indian lad who saved a wounded eaglet, and nursed it back to strength, and found, a year later, that in doing so he had cast his bread upon the waters.

The riffles were full of salmon, big, lusty fellows, who glided about his canoe on every side in an endless silver stream. Waukewa plunged his spear right and left, and tossed one glittering victim after another into the bark canoe. So absorbed in the sport was he that for once he did not notice when the head of the rapids was reached and the canoe began to glide more swiftly among the rocks. But suddenly he looked up, caught his paddle and dipped it wildly in the swirling water. The canoe swung sidewise, shivered, held its own against the torrent, and then slowly, inch by inch, began to creep upstream toward the shore. But suddenly there was a loud, cruel snap, and the paddle parted in the boy's hands, broken just above the blade! Waukewa gave a cry of despairing agony. Then he bent to the gunwale of his canoe and with the shattered blade fought desperately against the current. But it was useless. The racing torrent swept him downward; the hungry falls roared tauntingly in his ears.

Then the Indian boy knelt calmly upright in the canoe, facing the mist of the falls, and folded his arms. His young face was stern and lofty. He had lived like a brave hitherto—now he would die like one.

Faster and faster sped the doomed canoe toward the great cataract. The black rocks glided away on either side like phantoms. The roar of the terrible waters became like thunder in the boy's ears. But still he gazed calmly and sternly ahead, facing his fate as a brave Indian should. At last he began to chant the death song, which he had learned from the older braves. In a few moments all would be over. But he would come before the Great Spirit with a fearless hymn upon his lips.

Suddenly a shadow fell across the canoe. Waukewa lifted his eyes and saw a great eagle hovering over, with dangling legs, and a spread of wings that blotted out the sun. Once more the eyes of the Indian boy and the eagle met; and now it was the eagle who was master!

With a glad cry the Indian boy stood up in his canoe, and the eagle hovered lower. Now the canoe tossed up on that great swelling wave that climbs to the cataract's edge, and the boy lifted his hands and caught the legs of the eagle. The next moment he looked down into the awful gulf of waters from its very verge. The canoe was snatched from beneath him and plunged down the black wall of the cataract; but he and the struggling eagle were floating outward and downward through the cloud of mist. The cataract roared terribly, like a wild beast robbed of its prey. The spray beat and blinded, the air rushed upward as they fell. But the eagle struggled on with his burden. He fought his way out of the mist and the flying spray. His great wings threshed the air with a whistling sound. Down, down they sank, the boy and the eagle, but ever farther from the precipice of water and the boiling whirlpool below. At length, with a fluttering plunge, the eagle dropped on a sandbar below the whirlpool, and he and the Indian boy lay there a minute, breathless and exhausted. Then the eagle slowly lifted himself, took the air under his free wings, and soared away, while the Indian boy knelt on the sand, with shining eyes following the great bird till he faded into the gray of the cliffs.

Bones of Pere Marquette.

Surprise has been occasioned in Milwaukee by the report of the discovery of the supposed bones of Father Marquette near Frankfort, Mich. It has been generally supposed for the last 20 years that the remains of Father Marquette are in possession of Marquette college in Milwaukee. They were located by Father Jacker, an Indian missionary, in 1878, at St. Ignace, Mich., on the site of the chapel of the Mission of St. Ignatius, which Father Marquette founded in 1671. Father Jacker found the ruins of the chapel, and, digging beneath the altar's site, discovered the relics. They were sent to Marquette college, which was then being built. A celebration was held at St. Ignace in August, 1879, on account of Father Jacker's discovery.

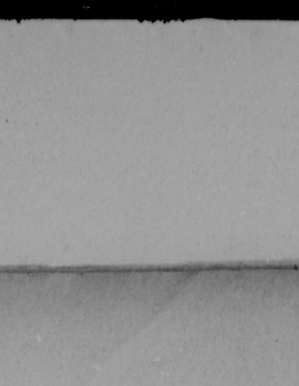
MEDICAL EXAMINER

Of the U. S. Treasury Recommends Peruna.



Dr. Llewellyn Jordan

Dr. Llewellyn Jordan, Medical Examiner of U. S. Treasury Department, graduate of Columbia College, and who served three years at West Point, has the following to say of Peruna:

"Allow me to express my gratitude to you for the benefit derived from your wonderful remedy. One short month has brought forth a vast change and I now consider myself a well man after months of suffering. Fellow sufferers, Peruna will cure you."

Catarrh is a systemic disease curable only by systematic treatment. A remedy that cures catarrh must aim directly at the depressed nerve centers. This is what Peruna does. Peruna immediately invigorates the nerve-centers which give vitality to the mucous membranes. Then catarrh disappears. Then catarrh is permanently cured.

Peruna cures catarrh wherever located. Peruna is not a guess nor an experiment—it is an absolute scientific certainty. Peruna has no substitutes—no rivals. Insist upon having Peruna.

A free book written by Dr. Hartman, on the subject of catarrh in its different phases and stages, will be sent free to any address by The Peruna Medicine Co., Columbus, Ohio.

A VICTIM OF MORPHINE.

Gifted Physician and Surgeon Has Himself Committed to the Workhouse to Get Away from Drug.

Among the prisoners in the workhouse on Blackwell's island is a talented young physician about whom there is a deep mystery. Dr. "John Hamilton" was the name he gave when he appeared before Magistrate Olmsted about six weeks ago and asked to be sentenced for six months that he might make one last desperate effort to free himself from the morphine habit.

Now that he has been wrested from the clutches of the drug to which he had become a veritable slave, "Dr. Hamilton" is frequently called on to serve as an assistant to the surgeons in operations in the workhouse hospital, and his skill as a physician is recognized. That he is of high social position and refinement no one can doubt after seeing him. His manner is that of a gentleman at all times, but he has confided nothing of his history to anyone on Blackwell's island.

Dr. James B. Moore, of 335 East Forty-first street, visiting physician to the prison on Blackwell's island, told, however, how Dr. Hamilton came to be there.

"One day last September a sallow-faced, thin, gawky young man walked into my office at No. 319 East Forty-first street," Dr. Moore explained, "and consulted me about treatment for the morphine habit. He said he was a physician, and implored me pitifully to help him overthrow the sway of the drug."

SENTENCED HIM TO SIX MONTHS' IMPRISONMENT.

Dr. Moore asked the young man as to his identity, but a shake of the head was his only response.

Dr. Moore then suggested to his caller that he go to a police court and ask to be sentenced to the workhouse on Blackwell's island, to which he readily consented. Dr. Moore accompanied him to court, and Magistrate Olmsted sentenced him to six months' imprisonment on the formal charge of narcotism. That very day the prisoner was sent to Blackwell's island, and Dr. Moore began work on him.

"I ascertained," said Dr. Moore to a World reporter, "that Hamilton had begun his downward course by taking an elixir, because he was a sufferer from rheumatism and wanted to relieve himself from the pain. Then he began taking doses of codein. This became too expensive as his doses became more frequent, and he then began to take morphine by hypodermic injection. The day he came into my office he was almost a complete wreck.

"Well, we have cured the man. He never takes the drug at all, and has been tempted in many ways lately. It is left all about him, but he does not touch it. He says it is his intention to practice medicine in New York city. He is apparently a good physician, judging from the assistance he has rendered us in the workhouse hospital. He positively refuses to tell anything further about himself, but I am convinced that his name is not Hamilton—certainly not John Hamilton."—N. Y. World.

Liquor for South Africa.

A British steamer recently carried 1,000 tons of spirits from Hamburg for South Africa. Speaking of this shipment, New Africa says: "The liquor traffic is a curse. It is an appalling sin—the degradation of Africa. It is no exaggeration to say that there exists no greater enemy to Africa and her peoples than this debasing and deteriorating evil. There is no greater obstacle to the progress of civilization in Africa than the increasing importation of spirituous liquors. It is spreading greater desolation and ruin than any other evil, and is worse than African superstition and barbarism. Thousands are daily sinking to depths of sin and shame by this virulent poison, which unprincipled merchants are constantly importing in enormous quantities to destroy manhood and arrest the development of the continent."

Says Breweries Don't Pay.

Henry Hagemeister, treasurer of the Wisconsin Brewers' association, says beer drinking is on the decrease in the Badger state. The days of fortune making in breweries has passed, and several large establishments now fail to return their fair percentage on the money invested. This condition has been brought about in large measure by increased consumption in homes. "When people drink beer at home," says Mr. Hagemeister, "they are satisfied when thirst is appeased. In saloons the social or treating feature makes them drink a great deal more. The result to the brewer can be easily understood."

DANGERS OF ALCOHOL

French Physician Who Furnishes Leaflet to All His Patients Warning Against Alcohol.

At the meeting of the Paris Hospital Medical society, M. Legendre, alarmed by the ever-increasing amount of drunkenness, asked if it would not be possible to withstand this by means of meetings, insistence on the dangers of alcohol, and by what he considered an even better method, that of getting up for the instruction of patients lantern shows with exhibitions of anatomic preparations to show the dangers of alcohol. M. Legendre has had printed for the use of all his patients a little leaflet, the text of which runs as follows:

Most of the diseases treated in the hospitals arise from alcoholic drinks—that is to say, they are either caused or aggravated by the use of alcohol. All alcoholic drinks are dangerous, and the most harmful are those which contain aromatics in addition to alcohol—as, for instance, absinthe and the so-called aperients, called ainers.

Alcoholic drinks are more dangerous when taken on an empty stomach or between meals. A man necessarily becomes alcoholic—i. e.: slowly poisoned by alcohol—even if he never gets drunk, when every day he drinks alcohol in the form of liquor or too much wine, more than one liter per diem.

Alcohol is a poison the habitual use of which destroys more or less quickly, but none the less certainly, all the organs most necessary to life—the stomach, the liver, the kidneys, the blood vessels, the heart, and the brain. Alcohol excites man, but does not strengthen him. It is no substitute for food, but takes away the taste for it. Those who often drink alcohol or too much wine (more than one liter a day) are much more liable to illness, and when ill are much worse, for the disease is often complicated with fatal delirium.

Alcohol is a frequent cause of consumption by its power of weakening the lungs. Every year we see patients who attend the hospitals for alcoholism come back some months later suffering from consumption. Fathers and mothers who drink often have children who are deformed or idiots or who die from fits.—London Lancet.

A JUDGE ON LIQUOR.

In His Charge to the Jury He Urges Total Abstinence During Term of Service.

In opening the superior court in Charlotte, the other day, the presiding judge said, in his charge to the jury:

"Gentlemen of the Jury, if any of you are in the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors, I hope you will desist from the habit this week. A man is not fit for the discharge of any duty when he is under the influence of whisky. It is not only a contempt of court, but it is a misdemeanor for a juror to become intoxicated. I wish, also, to impress the fact on the minds of the suitors, the witnesses and the officers of the court, that you cannot properly discharge your duty when under the influence of liquor."

Undoubtedly this testimony is true. Whisky does incapacitate men for business. No one wants to trade with an intoxicated merchant, or intrust his interests to an intoxicated lawyer or have an intoxicated physician prescribe for him, or an intoxicated jury decide a case in court. Yet men will drink it, and many who do not drnk will vote for it and keep the evil in the reach of those who are addicted to the habit. We do not see how such persons can hope to justify their conduct in the sight of God, when they help to keep a stumbling-block or an occasion to fall in their brother's way.—Our Young People.

TEMPERANCE FACTS.

A bill has passed the imperial diet of Japan prohibiting smoking by minors.

Westhofen, Germany, enforces an old ordinance, which forbids anyone walking in the street with a lighted cigar.

The production of beer increased 2,749,637 barrels last year. The total product in 1899 was 36,581,114 barrels, and in 1900 it was 39,330,849 barrels.

The intemperate use of tea and coffee produces results as real as those of drunkenness. Total blindness is often the result of excessive coffee drinking.

The remnant of the one great Penobscot tribe of Indians now living on an island near Oldtown, Me., have their own form of government. At their recent election they chose a prohibitionist chief named Mitchell Attean, by a vote of 25 to 23.

The number of wholesale dealers in beer and other malt liquors in this country increased from 6,577 in 1898 and 7,257 in 1899 to 7,739 in 1900, and the number of retail dealers from 12,071 in 1898 and 12,327 in 1899 to 12,716 during the same period.

A confirmed toper of Franklin, Pa., made a bet previous to the election that if McKinley was successful he would subsist entirely on whisky for six months. He essayed to fulfill his obligation, but after a few days his stomach revolted and he found it physically impossible to continue drinking. He has now become a strict teetotaler.

Drink Leads to Suicide.

Larcar Dorn, 60 years old, killed himself at New York by swallowing carbolic acid the other night. He tried to induce his wife to die with him, and when she refused he attempted to force the acid down her throat. While the couple were struggling, their daughters, Anna and Sophie, 29 and 25 years old, respectively, interfered. Dorn became enraged and dashed some of the acid on both of the girls. As a result, Anna will probably lose the sight of her right eye and Sophie is severely burned. Mrs. Dorn is not badly injured. Dorn died after drinking a big dose of the drug. He had been drinking heavily —Pittsburgh News.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 14, 1901.

President McKinley has practically recovered from the attack of the grip, but Dr. Rixey will not let him take any chances of a relapse; consequently he is, as yet, doing very little work. Being a man of robust health naturally, the forced confinement to his room has been particularly hard on the President, and it required all the persuasion of Mrs. McKinley to make him obey the doctor's orders.

Friends of the army reorganization bill are dissappointed that the measure has not yet reached a vote in the Senate, but they find some consolation in the positive promise of leading Senators that the bill will be passed this week. The delay is particularly aggravating to Secretary Root, because it keeps all his arrangements for bringing the volunteers home from the Philippines up in the air so to speak.

When the House took up the River and Harbor bill it was confidently expected that it would pass after about two days debate, but the general debate only came to an end to-day. The debate has consisted largely of complaint of the leaving out of projects in which members are interested.

Eulogies on deceased members are usually of the perfunctory order in Congress, but those on the late Senator Davis were not in that class. Mrs. Davis and a party of friends occupied seats in the Executive gallery during the delivery of the orations, of which a veteran newspaper man said: "In recent years in the Senate, no more beautiful, heartfelt and eloquent eulogies have been pronounced upon the memory of any Senator."

The D. B. Hill boom for 1904 reached Washington forty-eight hours ago in charge of Bird S. Coler, Comptroller of the City of New York. That it is not a secret boom may be seen from Mr. Coler's very frank reply when asked what brought him to Washington: "I have been seeing Democratic Senators and Representatives in the interest of David B. Hill's nomination for President. I believe Mr. Hill will be the nominee in 1904. I think he will have the support of Democrats of every state in the Union. His friends have taken hold of this matter in earnest, and are going to push his claims for the nomination with great vigor from this time on. I have not heard a single objection to Hill's nomination, and I have talked to many leading Democrats from different parts of the country. On the contrary, what I have heard confirms me in the belief that Hill will be the next Democratic nominee for President." The invasion of the Hill boom seems to have taken the thick and thin Bryan Democrats by surprise. Their private talk indicates that the Hill Democrats and the Bryan Democrats may indulge in a little figurative throat cutting before long.

The Burleigh Reapportionment bill only needs President McKinley's signature to become a law, and that it will get during the present week. It went through the House by a majority of 63 and through the Senate without a division.

At a single sitting the House passed 170 private pension bills, which was the largest number disposed of in one day since the fifty-first Congress.

By a vote of 32 to 19, the Senate has again put itself on record in favor of the Philippine policy of President McKinley. The vote was an amendment to the Army Reorganization bill offered by Senator Hoar, providing that no further military force shall be used in the Philippines, except such as might be necessary to keep order in places already in the peaceable possession of the United States. The effect of the amendment, if it had been adopted, would have been to encourage the Filipino rebels to gather a big army in any portion of the islands not actually garrisoned by our troops, without fear of molestation, while supposedly in the interest of peace, such an amendment would actually operate to prolong hostilities. History has taught that rebellion cannot be put down by Pacific legislation; that those who appeal to arms against the powers that be must be whipped into subjection. That has been true even in advanced civilized nations. Any other method of ending a revolt of the semi-barbarous Filipinos would convince them that the Americans were afraid of them.

Senator Platt, of Conneticut, stated the case in a nut shell when he said of the Democratic pretense of believing that the President would abuse the discretion vested in him by the Amy bill to increase the Army when necessary: "If we could eliminate politics and argument for political effect from this chamber for a single day, I believe it would be the unanimous sentiment that there should be some flexibility in the army."

Senator Hanna usually declines to take notice of charges made against him by unfriendly newspapers, but he made an exception of the charge that he had a personal interest in the passing of the Ship Subsidy bill, and authorized the following explicit denial: "I say that the assertion that I am interested in any way or in any company that has given orders for the construction of colliers through which it is expected to participate in the benefits to be derived from the passage of the Shipping bill is absolutely false and without foundation. My sole interest in the Shipping bill is that of of an American citizen who honestly believes in the upbuilding of the Merchant Marine."

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 24. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, JANUARY 24, 1901. NUMBER 46.

HER LONG REIGN HAS ENDED.

Death of Queen Alexandrina Victoria, of England.

EDWARD THE SEVENTH IS NOW KING.

For Nearly Sixty-four Years the Late Queen Has Occupied the Throne--Sketch of Her Life and Some of the Events of Her Reign.

COWES, Isle of Wight, Jan. 22.—The Victorian era has ended. After a reign of nearly 64 years, Victoria, Queen of Great Britain and Ireland and Empress of India, is dead. She passed away at Osborne at 6:55 this evening. (6:55 P. M., Greenwich time is 1:55 P. M. standard time at Baltimore.)

A telegram sent by the Prince of Wales to the Lord Mayor of London, timed at Osborne, 6:55 in the evening, announced the Queen's death.

At her bedside at the end were gathered the Emperor of Germany, the Prince of Wales and the remaining members of the royal family. The end was peaceful, the Queen seemingly falling into a peaceful sleep at the end.

Early today her physicians announced that yesterday's rally was but temporary, and that she was rapidly sinking. It was given out that the end was near, and the members of the royal family were summoned to her side.

She lingered throughout the day, contrary to expectation, and died shortly after sunset.

At about 4 o'clock the Prince of Wales caused a notice to be posted at the Mansion House stating that the Queen's life was in the gravest danger. That was taken as an evidence that the end was near, and everyone prepared for the worst. Several hours later the Queen passed away.

The Queen passed away quietly, without a struggle. She sank to rest in the presence of the Prince of Wales (now King and Emperor), the Princess of Wales, the Duke of York and other members of the royal family.

With the members of the royal family gathered at the Queen's bedside, the Bishop of Winchester and the rector of Whippingham read prayers for those in extremis. Happily the Queen was able to recognize those around her. They came to her bedside, but the physician had warned them against attempts to speak to her. Naturally, the family, while recognizing the claim for public information, insist that the details of the events around the deathbed shall be sacred for the present, and imposed the strictest secrecy on the whole household.

The arrival of the Lord Clarendon (the Lord Chamberlain) is considered ominous, because the arrangements for the succession to the throne will be in his hands.

The Queen is said to have bid farewell, in a feeble monosyllable to her family, assembled at her bedside at midday. She first recognized the Prince of Wales, to whom she spoke a few words of great moment: then Emperor William and the others present filed past and heard a whispered goodbye. All those in the bedroom were in tears.

The Prince of Wales will be immediately notified of the Queen's death and will be proclaimed King. According to the programme, this will be done an hour after the Queen's death. The Prince takes the oath of King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and its territories. Many of the highest officers in the Cabinet and in the Privy Council flow at Osborne or near at hand will attend to the formalities of making the new King. The Prince of Wales will appear before the Earl of Halsbury, the Lord High Chancellor, and Frederick Temple, the Archbishop of Canterbury, in one of the private apartments of the castle. Lord Halsbury will formally notify the Prince of the death of the Queen and of his accession. Then the Prince will take the oath.

London, Jan. 22—7:07 P. M.—The full text of the Prince of Wales' dispatch to the Lord Mayor is as follows:

"Osborne, 6:55 P. M.—My beloved mother has just passed away, surrounded by her children and grandchildren."

QUEEN'S BUSY LIFE.

Her Career Marked with Acts that Brought Good to Her People.

Victoria, Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Empress of India, was born May 24, 1819. She was the only child of Edward, Duke of Kent, fourth son of George III. Victoria was born at Kensington Palace. Her mother was Victoria Marie Louisa, a daughter of Francis, Duke of Saxe-Coburg, and sister of Lepold, King of the Belgians.

Victoria's mother was twice married, her first husband being the Prince of Leiningen, who died in 1814. Four years after his death Victoria Marie Louisa, mother of England's dead Queen, married the Duke of Kent, the Queen's father. The Duke died two years later; after his child—his only child—had been born. At the time of his death the late Queen was only 8 months old. The infant was baptized with the names Alexandrina Victoria.

The Duchess of Northumberland was associated with the mother in the work of educating the Princess. Her early political education tended to make her a Whig, her father having been affiliated with that party in England. To the Viscount Melbourne is due credit for having thoroughly instructed her in the British Constitution. The daughter of the Duke of Kent ascended the throne of the United Kingdom on the death of her uncle, William IV., June 20, 1837. Her uncle, the Duke of Cumberland, became King of Hanover by virtue of the law excluding females from the throne, and so the long connection between the crowns of Hanover and England was terminated.

Victoria was proclaimed Queen on June 21, 1837, and crowned at Westminster on June 28, 1838. She found on her accession that Viscount Melbourne was at the head of the government. On a change of the administration, in 1839, she refused to change, in accordance with precedent, the ladies of the bed-chamber. The result was that Peel resigned and Melbourne's administeation was prolonged until 1841. A year earlier, February 10, 1840, the young Queen was married, in St. James' Palace, to Prince Albert, Prince of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha and second son of the then reigning Duke.

The long reign, nearly 64 years, is the longest in the history of England. It has also been of the greatest, and so closely was the Queen identified with it it was known as the Victorian era. In it Britain has grown both internally and externally, her possessions becoming more numerous in the various parts of the world, and her civilization keeping pace with her growth. Her reign was not a peaceful reign, as wars and rumors of war were never wanting during her long career. She lived to see England triumphant over the country's enemies, however, and maintain her position as the empire power of the world.

In 1861 Victoria's husband died, and for several years the Queen secluded herself from public life. She never neglected her duties as Queen during this time, however. In 1876 she was further honored, the title "Empress of India" being added to her royal titles.

No former monarch ever so thoroughly comprehended the great truth that the powers of the Crown are held in trust for the people, and are the means and not the end of government. This enlightened policy entitled her to the glorious distinction of being the most constitutional monarch Britain ever possessed. Many claim that the Queen's power was curbed to such an extent that she was little more than a figurehead, but there can be little doubt that she was a real power and that she was instrumental in bringing to England many of its richest blessings.

Queen Victoria had four sons and five daughters — Albert Edward, Prince of Wales; Alfred Ernest Albert, Duke of Saxe-Coburg; Arthur William Patrick Albert, Duke of Connaught; Victoria Adelaide Marie Louisa, Empress (Frederick) of Germany; Helena Augusta Victoria, Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein; Louise Carolina Alberta, Marchioness of Lorne, and Beatrice Mary Victoria Feodore, Princess Henry of Battenberg.

During her reign she also had 11 administrators. In this list of administrators are found the names of many of England's most famous men. Among them were Sir Robert Peel, Earl Russell, Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Gladstone (four times), Earl of Beaconsfield and the Marquis of Salisbury.

The wars during Victoria's reign were many in number and almost in every case successful. A list of these wars is as follows:

1838, insurrection in Canada; 1839, British forces occupy Cabul and take possssion of Aden; 1840, war expedition to Syria, Mehemet Ali sues for peace; 1841, successful insurrection in Cabul: British invade China and take Canton and Amoy; 1842, British take Boer Republic in Natal; 1845, outbreak first Sikh War; 1848, insurrection in Ireland attempted; outbreak second Sikh War; Boers establish Republic; 1850, Taiping rebellion in China; 1851, Burmah provoked British hostilities; 1854, Crimean War; 1856, Crimean War finished; England attacks China; Persians occupy Herat but British drive them out of India; 1857, outbreak of Indian mutiny; 1860, Anglo-French expedition to Pekin; 1861, England sends a fleet to Mexico; 1867, Fenian insurrection in Ireland; 1874, Ashantee War; 1877, British take Transvaal Republic; 1878, war against Afghanistan; 1879, war against Zulus; Roberts enters Kandahar; Transvaal uprising; 1881, Majuba Hill; Mahdi revolt in Soudan; 1882, war against Arabi Pasha; 1885, Gordon killed in Khartoum; 1893, war in Matabeleland; 1896, Kitchner occupies Dongola; Ashantees accept British sovereignty; 1896, revolt of Indian hill tribes, and in 1899, Transvaal declared war, October 11.

Her Majesty, it is said, paid the penalty for her devotion to the affairs of state. It is generally recognized that until a few days ago there was no harder worker in the kingdom. Roughly estimated, she signed 50,000 documents yearly. No dispatch of any gravity was ever issued from the Foreign Office until seen by the Queen, and some idea of the work thus entailed is gathered from the fact that the Foreign Office handles considerably over a thousand dispatches weekly.

After every sitting of the House of Commons the Government leader in the House was in the habit of forwarding to the Queen an abstract of the business done. She personally attended to these abstracts and frequently returned them with marginal notes, asking for explanations.

Ellen Terry's appearance at Sandringham before the Queen is recalled as being the only occasion on which Her Majesty ever prompted an actress. Mistaking a pause by Miss Terry for forgetfulness, the Queen gave her the cue very softly. As Miss Terry did not take the cue, the Queen repeated it more loudly, and the actress, suppressing her merriment, accepted the cue and proceeded with her part.

Of pathetic interest now is the inscription on the last wreath from the Queen which was placed on the Bishop of London's coffin on Thursday last. It did not bear her own signature, and this is the first instance on record of such a happening. It was regarded at the time by the court officials as a sign of serious importance.

The Queen received for her services from the British people something like $120,000,000. Her official income was $1,875,000 a year, $2,500,000 less than that of the Emperor of Austria, $1,000,000 less than King Victor's, $500,000 less than the Shah of Persia's and only half as much as the Kaiser's.

EDWARD VII. KING.

Was Prince of Wales for Over Half Century.

King Edward VII., for over half a century Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, was born on November 9, 1841. He was the second child and oldest son of the Queen.

The boyhood of the King was uneventful. His early education was conducted at home under the tutilage of Rev. H. M. Birch, rector of Prestwick; Mr. Gibbs, barrister at law; the Rev. C. F. Tarver and Mr. H. W. Fisher. He then studied for a session at Edinburg, and later entered Christ Church, Oxford. Here he attended public lectures for a year, and afterward resided for several terms at Trinity College, Cambridge, for the same purpose.

His earlier appearance in a leading part on any public occasion was in 1859 at the laying of the foundation stone of the Lambeth School of Art at Vauxhall. After the death of his father, in December, 1861, he naturally became the most desirable functionary at all ceremonies in which beneficent and charitable undertakings were to be recognized by royal approval.

This work has ever since occupied a large share of his time and has always been performed with dignity, tact and patience. Indeed, no Prince of any country has ever personally exerted himself more faithfully to render services of this sort to the community. The multiplicity and variety of his engagements on behalf of local and special enterprises make a surprising list, and necessarily involve a sacrifice of ease and leisure which few men of high rank would care to make.

In the summer of 1860 he paid a visit to Canada and the United States. Everywhere he was received with enthusiasm. He danced at a ball given in his honor at Washington, where he was cordially welcomed by President Buchanan. He also visited Baltimore the same year.

In 1863 his engagement was announced to Princess Alexandra, the eldest daughter of the King of Denmark. She was three years younger than him, and though comparatively poor, was beautiful and accomplished. The marriage was celebrated in St. George's Chapel, Windsor Castle, on March 10, 1863. The new King made his maiden speech in the House of Lords in 1884.

TALK BECOMES SERIOUS.

Democrats Believe Extra Session a Certainty.

Governor Smith Returns to Baltimore After Visit to Frederick. Baughman Has A Boom.

Monday's Baltimore News.

In Democratic circles the talk of an extra session of the Legislature has settled down into a strong belief that Governor Smith will very soon issue a formal call for the lawmakers to meet at Annapolis. This conviction is so strong that many of the camp-followers who are always on the look-out for places are figuring on the possibility of securing a committee clerkship or a position as doorkeeper or folder. Those who held similar positions last winter are hoping that they will be retained, and the "outs" are trusting that there may be a new organization, with new employees.

Governor Smith had not visited his local office today, although he has reported in town. As the guest of L. Victor Baughman at Frederick on Saturday the Governor had an opportunity to hear the views of a number of Western Maryland Democrats. A dispatch from Frederick to The News today says:

Governor John Walter Smith, who for the past two days has been the guest of Gen. L. Victor Baughman at Poplar Terrace, near Frederick, left late yesterday afternoon for Baltimore.

During his visit Governor Smith found the party leaders of this county absolutely in harmony with any desire that General Baughman may entertain in regard to the calling of an extra session of the Maryland General Assembly. The Governor carefully refrained from expressing himself upon the subject of an extra session, and while General Baughman has likewise been reticent upon that matter, it is generally understood that he is anxious for a change in the present ballot system.

The fact that the party is entirely harmonious in this county under the leadership of General Baughman, together with the recent visit of Governor Smith, has had the effect of launching a big boom for him as the next Democratic nominee for Governor. Party leaders do not hesitate to say that General Baughman will have the earnest support of Governor Smith in his fight for the nomination.

Governor Smith will meet the recently appointed members of his staff, including General Baughman, at his local office to-morrow to make arrangements for attending the inauguration of President McKinley, and it is thought important developments concerning the extra session of the Legislature may occur.

Republicans generally are keeping very quiet on the subject of the extra session. The position they assume is that they are not looking for trouble, but if it comes their way they will be ready for it. Should the Democrats decide to put the extra session through, it is said that Messrs. Goldsborough, McComas, Mudd and Mason will camp out in Annapolis until the fight is through, and the best checker-board fight possible will be put up by these and the State and city leaders they will summon to their assistance. The Democrats can count on getting a good run for their money at any rate, if good parliamentary knowledge and resourceful tactics will amount to anything. A prominent Republican, in speaking about the matter today, said:

"I can hardly believe that Governor Smith will call an extra session of the Legislature. From all I can learn, he is the man who has most to lose by the scheme. Even supposing that the Massachusetts law or some such law is passed there is not a man in this state who can fortell the outcome of the experiment and notwithstanding the many assurances which the Governor has received that it will come out all right, I am informed that he is still dubious on the question, and strictly from a party standpoint. The Democrats can make an awful mess out of this matter and the Governor knows it as well as any other man in the State.

"Mr. Gorman might go in and clean up the Senatorship in the first year, but just where the party would stand in 1903 is not as plain. The trouble with the whole matter is that the number of illiterates, as returned by the election supervisors throughout the State is by no means correct. Many a man who can sign his name to a receipt will make oath that he can read and write, when in point of fact the reading and writing of his own signature is about the extent of his education.

"White men particularly object to having it known that they cannot read and write, and the real number of illiterates in the State when men go into the election booths and are forced to pick out of a jumbled-up list the candidates for whom they wish to vote is an unknown quantity. Contests over the ballots will be innumerable.

"In making the claim against the negro controlling the elections in this State one might just as well say that the blue-eyed men hold the balance of power, or the Southern Methodists or any other race or set of people. There is such a small balance of power that it could belong to almost any class. One thing is true, if the negroes are responsible for the Republicans winning and the condition of politics being so much changed in this State; if they are responsible for a condition where both parties are trying to put up their best candidates and are vying with each other in promising reform legislation; if it is to them we owe the situation as it exists now that practically every resident of the State and city feels that the money he pays in taxes is going to the objects for which it was intended and not into the pockets of political hunkers; if we owe it to the negro that Mr. Rasin disgorged $19,000 which he owed to the State, and that without even the formality of a trial, then I say that the white people of this State owe the negro a vote of thanks instead of disfranchising him. There is no claim of Republican misrule in this state. There is no defalcation to point to. To the unbiased, the Republican State and city government has been just as good, if not, indeed, better, than the Democrats gave."

THE LORD'S REWARDS.

Trust the Lord to see you when you play a Christian's part,
Trust the Lord to hear you when you soothe the orphan's heart;
Trust the Lord to guide you through the dangers of the day,
Rise up in the morning always trusting that the Lord
May be always pleased to keep you in the narrow, righte us way—
Trusting on and hoping on to gain the sweet reward
That never is forgotten when you kneel at night to pray.

Trust the Lord to see you when you do a noble deed,
Trust the Lord to know it when you fill the widow's need;
Trust the Lord to watch you and to keep you in His care,
Trust to be rewarded when it's time for your reward,
But waste no precious moments beating blindly in the air—
Calling out for blessings and for favors from the Lord—
Just a little duty done is worth a life of solemn prayer.

HER COUSIN IDA

By Mrs. Moses P. Handy.

(Copyright, 1900, the Authors' Syndicate.)

"WELL, Abby, Ida will be here next week; she wants me to take her to board for a spell."

Abby Merrill walked across the room, sat down, and began to knit, before she answered: "Why? It isn't summer."

"No, but her father and Mrs. Stanton are going to Seattle, and Ida don't want to take the trip. I have an idea she is not any too fond of her stepmother. Anyhow, she wants to stay here until they come back."

"Of course we shall have to take her."

Mrs. Merrill looked at her daughter in astonishment. "Of course! Have you anything against it? I thought you would be delighted. You didn't want to let her out of your sight when she was here two years back. For my part, I'm glad she's coming. She is such good company, and she never gives a mite of trouble, just fits in, and is always ready to help. It isn't every girl who has been used to the best of everything, like Ida, who would be so fond of her country kinfolks."

"I'm sure, mother, her mother was your own first cousin."

"Yes, but some girls wouldn't like me any better for that. To be sure, we are not to say poor, but we are different to the fine folks Ida goes with in town."

"Yes," assented Abby, "I suppose we are. But I don't know why you think I mind her coming. I just thought it queer."

To tell the truth, Abby Merrill did not share her mother's satisfaction in the expected arrival. She admired her cousin extravagantly, and it was for that very reason that, just now, she would have preferred that she should stay away. Abby understood perfectly that she was overshadowed by her brilliant cousin. Ida Stanton was unusually pretty, she had had every advantage of education and travel; moreover, she was clever, and possessed of personal magnetism in a high degree. Abby dreaded her coming; how much she did not want her mother to know. For the girl was in love, and believed her affection returned, although no vows had passed between her and her lover. There was a new minister at Merrill's Corner, young, unmarried, and in Abby's eyes altogether lovely. He liked her better than any other girl in the congregation, she was sure of that. But Cousin Ida was coming, and how could any man fail to fall in love with her? "I wouldn't mind," poor Abby said to herself, "if there was any chance that she would fall in love with him. But she won't, she will just break his heart, and make him miserable. I always feel like a sparrow by the side of an oriole when I am with Cousin Ida, and I don't suppose Mr. Kirkland will look at me while she is here."

Ida Stanton was really fond of her cousins. She was a born flirt and held all men as her legitimate prey, but she would not have hurt Abby for a great thing, still less a small one. When Mr. Kirkland called soon after her arrival, she welcomed him as something superior to the young farmers whom she expected to meet. However, her long-lashed, hazel-gray eyes were quick to see, and Abby's blush and look of apprehension enlightened her instantly. "Hands off," she said to herself, and gave her whole attention to the shawl which she was knitting for her cousin Jane. Nevertheless, she was conscious that the minister looked, not once, but many times, in her direction, although, like a good little girl, she spoke only when she was spoken to. Was it her fault that Mr. Kirkland thought her voice one of the sweetest he had ever heard, and listened intently to the few words which she spoke during his visit? When he left, his visions were not of Abby's child-like blue eyes, but of hazel ones, veiled by long lashes, and of slim white fingers flitting among meshes of crimson wool.

When he called again, matters were even worse. Mr. Merrill was at home, and, intent upon entertaining the minister, he insisted that Ida should sing and play. It was impossible for her to refuse, and her voice simply entranced Arthur Kirkland. He was passionately fond of music, and Ida's was of a kind which he rarely heard.

"You will join our choir, won't you, Miss Stanton?" he begged.

But Ida smiled a negative. "It would hardly be worth while for the short time I shall be here; but I always sing in church, where there is congregational singing."

It was all up with the reverend Arthur Kirkland from that time forth. It was useless for Ida to endeavor not to attract him. Besides, Miss Stanton reckoned without her host. The reverend Arthur was accustomed to be admired, not to say pursued; her indifference piqued him, and made him all the more attentive. Not that she gave him much chance for attention. On the contrary, she handed him over to Abby, ostentatiously, upon all occasions. His visits to the Merrills became more frequent, and the whole neighborhood settled it that he was going to marry Abby. No one dreamed of Ida except that young woman herself, and Abby, who grew pale and thin, to the distress and wonder of her mother, who dosed her with herb teas, of course to no purpose.

Miss Stanton was honestly provoked. Why upon earth should the magnet fancy the silver churn? I fear she very nearly snubbed the reverend Arthur, but he seemed impervious to neglect, and she dared not be openly rude to Cousin Jane's minister.

"What can I do?" she asked herself. "I cannot stay here and see that idiot who don't know a good thing when he has it, breaking that foolish child's heart, yet what excuse can I make for leaving before papa comes home?"

In all her life Ida Stanton was never so thankful for an invitation as for one which came while she was worrying over the situation. She had come to the Corner for rest and quiet, and had told no one her address, so that the letter, from an intimate friend in a distant city, was a surprise.

"I saw Mrs. Stanton on her way west," wrote the friend, "and she told me you were buried in that out-of-the-way country place. At this time of year, such conduct on your part is absurd, and I don't mean to allow it, especially as I need you badly. Come to me at once. John says we are to do a lot of entertaining this winter, and I want you dreadfully. Start immediately, and wire me, at my expense, of course."

The sincere regret with which Cousin Jane and her husband heard of Ida's intended departure was more than counterbalanced by the expression of joyful relief which illuminated Abby's face when she was told the news. "Ah, well, it is better that she should blame me," Ida thought. "She will forgive her dear Arthur the more readily. And why should I care?" Nevertheless she was so much upset that she went for a long walk, in order to put herself into tune.

It was with no pleasant emotions that, after she had tramped for a mile or so, she beheld the reverend Arthur advancing from the opposite direction. Escape was impossible, but she felt that she hated him, as he hastened to meet her with his hand outstretched.

"I am glad to see you, Miss Ida," he said, as he shook her reluctant fingers. "But you ought not to wander so far, alone."

"I don't think there is any danger," the girl replied.

"Better keep on the safe side. What would you do if you met a tramp?"

"Wish for a man to take care of me, I suppose," she answered, flippantly, and then turned red with vexation as she saw her mistake.

"I wish you would let me take care of you from this time henceforth," said the reverend Arthur, eagerly.

Ida laughed, and shook her head. "You would find me a handful."

"Don't laugh; I am in sober earnest. I love you with all my heart; indeed I do."

Ida's face was serious enough now. "No, you do not. You don't know me at all, you have an ideal that isn't like me in the least. I am worldly, I am selfish, the last woman you know, whom you ought to marry. Fancy me a country minister's wife! Why I am not even orthodox. I believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, beyond that I am sure of nothing, and I follow Him afar off. I could not even join your church. And I do not love you, not the least little bit. I love luxury, and I shall never marry any but a rich man.

"Besides, you are so foolish that I have no patience with you. Think how you have treated Abby, dear little Abby who loves you so. You made her believe you loved her, and you won her pure little heart. She is better than I every way. You want me to think that you love me, as if I could be such a fool. I am going away to-morrow. After I leave you will come to your senses, at least I hope so. Good-by." And she walked off quickly in the direction of home, leaving Arthur Kirkland too much astonished to answer, or indeed to do anything but stare.

He was angry and hurt; his vanity stung to the quick, and he told himself that never had he been so deceived in anyone, and thanked Heaven for a great deliverance.

A year or so later, when Abby showed Arthur the beautiful wedding present which her cousin had sent them, he scarcely noticed it, and without saying a word he took from his pocket a newspaper clipping which he handed her.

Abby read: "It is said that Miss Ida Stanton, daughter of David Stanton, of the V. K. & Q. R. R., is engaged to John Neilson, the Idaho mining magnate. The engagement is not yet announced, but neither of the parties denies it."

"Oh!" exclaimed Abby. "Why, he is one of the richest men in the United States, isn't he?"

"So reported," replied the reverend Arthur. "Well, that is what she wants. Miss Stanton, I fear, is thoroughly worldly."

Abby's eyes filled with tears. "Please don't say that," she pleaded, then after a pause: "Do you know I thought you were in love with her a year ago?"

Her Arthur smiled. "Did you? As if she could be compared to you!" And he really meant it.

BLUSHES IN THE SHOWERS.

A Small Florida Tree That Turns a Beautiful Crimson When the Rain Falls on It.

"Among the many wonders of those strange swamps there is nothing more surprising than the blushing tree," said Albert F. Dewey, of Punta Gorda, Fla., who, according to a local exchange, recently passed a month in the everglades of Florida.

"The blushing tree," continued Mr. Dewey, "is by no means common. It is found only in the densest thickets of those interminable marshes, whose luxuriant vegetation is a revelation to explorers. It is called the blushing tree by those who know it because it actually blushes when the rain falls upon it. The phenomenon is apparently incomprehensible. It never fails to astound those who see it for the first time. The mysterious and beautiful glow of color which it assumes in a rainstorm baffles description. The Seminole Indians, who once ruled Florida, have always known of the tree, and in their musical language, now fast disappearing, have words which mean 'the maiden tree, which reddens at the coming of her lover, the rain.'

"In company with a taciturn Indian guide I journeyed 40 miles to see this marvelous bit of vegetable life. I could scarcely believe the story he told me, yet curiosity at length overcame incredulity, and we set forth one morning in a small canoe. We spent nearly three days paddling and poling our way over the winding waters. In the afternoon of the third day I began to wonder if he had only been deceiving me for the sake of the boat hire and his pay as guide, when he gave a grunt of satisfaction and pointed to the right.

"Distrustfully I followed him ashore and through the underbrush. Beneath great cypress trees, hoary with the gray hanging moss, and past immense bay trees we wended our way inland. Eagerly he led the way until reaching the edge of a little open space he stopped, and with silent pride pointed toward the center. Gracefully a tree with broad, banana-like leaves reared itself aloft. Widespreading branches hung down, slightly waving in the warm breeze. Its emerald-hued foliage was the most beautiful I had ever beheld. It rose to a height of 20 feet and its thick, substantial trunk indicated many years of existence. This, the old Seminole informed me, was 'the blushing tree.'

"I told him to prepare to camp here until it rained, regardless of time. We unrolled our blankets, stretched our mosquito bars, without which one cannot sleep in the glades, cooked supper and rolled up in our blankets for the night. That night, the day following and the next night passed without rain.

"I began to think it would never rain, when about noon a cloud darkened the sky overhead. I put a rubber poncho over my shoulders and fixed my eyes on the green and pretty tree a dozen yards away. It was covered with a greenish insect, the size of a large woodtick, which intensified its color. The rain began to fall in torrents, after its custom in that region. Beside me, grinning confidently, with a pipe in his mouth, stood the Seminole.

"As the cool water drenched the tree I was amazed to note a changing of color. Gradually, yet unmistakably, the green hue was giving way to pink. The Indian had told the truth. The tree was blushing at the rain.

"In a few minutes the green had faded from sight. Only in a few half-hidden spots beneath broad branches and on its trunk was there a large tint of green to be seen. The tree was as pink as the cheek of a healthy girl.

"After an hour or more the shower passed over, and I watched with no less interest the wonderful tree assume its familiar green once more. As it was changing back to emerald I suddenly realized the secret of the phenomenon. The tiny insects and not the tree itself changed color. These peculiar parasites are possessed of the power of chameleons. In the bright warm sunshine they are greener than the tree on which they live, but when the chilly rain falls upon them they contract their little backs and become a pretty pink in color. Millions of them thus change the tint of the tree. They are found only upon one species of trees which grow in certain portions of the everglades."

Spread of the Coffee Tree.

Some interesting facts regarding the coffee tree have been printed recently. The native home of this plant is said to be Kaffra, in southern Abyssinia. It was not until it had been in use for centuries by the Arabians that a plant was carried to Java. In 1706 a tree from Java was sent to Amsterdam, and when it flowered and ripened seeds a young seedling was presented to Louis XIV. From this plant seedlings were sent to Martinique, and from these plants again seedlings were sent to Jamaica, Cayenne and San Domingo; while from Amsterdam plants were sent to Surinam. In fact, it was from the one plant, sent from Java in the beginning of the eighteenth century by Governor General Van Hoorn, that everything in the French possessions and West Indies sprang. In this way have traveled the progeny of the original coffee plant, introduced from Arabia at the end of the seventeenth century.—Chicago Chronicle.

TEMPERANCE PROGRESS.

A Look Backward That Infuses New Courage and Hope for Cause of Reform in Future.

There is so much said concerning the prevailing intemperance that many are discouraged and conclude that the temperance cause is making no progress. There has been, in certain directions, a painful and dangerous increase of the liquor power, and we have much reason to feel the deepest anxiety concerning the future, but we believe there is too much discouragement. The range of view is not as wide as it should be; a sufficient length of time is not taken in. The movement of a meteor must be measured in the fraction of a second, but months, or even years, are required to measure the movement of a glacier. In many directions the changes have been so rapid and so great, that we unconsciously demand that all movements for the betterment of men should move at the same rate. We forget that the mightiest forces are unfelt as they change the world. The evil of intemperance is of giant power and of unmeasured resources, and has withal its chief source of power in the restless nervousness of this age, in which a demand for stimulants is created by our overtaxing energy. But the moral forces working for temperance are also mighty and are moving with a force that should give us great encouragement. The results already attained give confidence as to the future.

Make a comparison in which many years are included. Set the stake at, say, fourscore years ago; it was about that time the temperance reform began its wonderful movement. In our earlier years we heard the old people tell of the condition of the social life at that day, and we are amazed at the statements made of the good people who regarded liquors as a part of ordinary, even necessary, provision for life. Not many years ago the ruins of still-houses were to be seen on numberless farms in western Pennsylvania, still-houses once owned and operated by devout Scotch-Irish Presbyterians without a thought of wrong. The right to distill was questioned by very few, and the use of the product of the still was condemned by a number equally small. Whisky was in every house and was used as an expression of hospitality. The jug in the field was one of the requirements for harvesters, and a dram was taken at the end of almost every round, the farmer and his helpers being together members in good standing in orthodox churches. The bottle was on the sideboard, or table, and common courtesy offered a glass to the pastor when he called—a courtesy that few had the enlightened conscience to decline—often with the result of an unhappy condition by the time he returned to his home in the evening. Even so short a time ago as 30 or 40 years, drinking booths were open at the polls; whisky and ballots went together, and many a voter, sober at other times, went home from the election drunk. When the temperance reform began it met with no little resistance from church members. On what records of presbyteries and synods of that period are there resolutions enjoining total abstinence, or debarring even the liquor seller from communion? What public man was turned down 40 years ago for intemperance? The change in the moral sentiment and social standard has been very great, so great that we feel ourselves strengthened for the future work. Another generation of this seemingly slow movement—we would it could be hastened—will fill the world with blessing and joy.

Conditions have changed, and we do not always take proper note of this in our discussions. Formerly the manufacture and sale of liquors were distributed over the country. Distilleries were everywhere, taverns lined every stage and principal wagon route, and many a night of high carnival was seen in houses now occupied as quiet residences. Now the liquor business is in the hands of a few, whose great capital has become a terrible menace, and our lower-grade foreign population, then unknown, greatly aids in furnishing customers to the saloons. In this there is the same capitalistic movement which marks the legitimate industries, its power for evil being multiplied indefinitely by the nature of the business. This must be met, and to meet it successfully the moral sentiment of the people must be awakened and aroused. To this we are encouraged by the past success of the temperance reform. Let the smoldering fires be fanned into a blaze that will run as on the dry prairie.—United Presbyterian.

Kipling on Drinking in South Africa.

So far as I could see in South Africa, it did not much matter what sort of spirits a man fancied, because there was not the least danger of his getting more than was good for him. On the other hand, men who could do without liquid, who did not fancy that they needed to flood their insides every two or three hours, got on better than men who, through mere physical incontinence and carelessness, were always sucking at their water bottles. In this, as in all things, the man who is temperate, in the full sense of the word, survives.—St. James' Gazette.

KICKED OUT.

It was a cheerless winter night. The fierce wind from the north blew the falling snow full into the face of the bloated wretch who forced his way with bowed head and bent frame against the storm that cut to the marrow of his bones.

In the heart of the great city, with its hundred thousand homes, he was all alone. No place to sleep, no home, no friend. God, how the cold clutched at his heart! He must be warmed without and within, or die. There is a saloon across the street, a warm fire and plenty to drink. Just one drink. How it would warm and cheer him! Just one. He will try. No money with which to buy, he must beg, but he will try. He crosses the street and enters. How cheerful. He hugs the stove a moment and its warmth cheers him on to the attempt. He stands at the bar. Almost within reach are the tempting bottles full of the liquor for which his whole being craves. Oh, how he would love to clutch them one by one and drain them to the last drop. He begins to plead.

"Mister, just one drink. I have no money and no place to sleep. It's a bitter cold night. Just one drink, please, sir!"

"Out, you sot!" The words cut like a knife to his heart. "Get out! You are a disgrace to my house!"

He reeled from the counter as if he had been struck. Again he hugs the stove, trying to warm the wretched rags that cover his shivering body.

"Come, get away there," cries the barkeeper. "John, kick this loafer into the street."

John, a burly negro, seizes him by the shoulder, drags him to the door, and kicks him far out upon the pavement. The door is shut behind him and he is out again in the storm.

The cat purrs upon the window sill and rubs her hairy sides against the panes. The dog warms his cold nose by the fire within; but there is no comfort for him. The wind howls and moans and tugs at his rags, as if it were trying to tear them from him. He draws them closer to his shivering frame and wanders away into the night.

The morning comes, clear, bright and cold. Two blocks away from the saloon door in a narrow, dark street he was found half buried by the white drift in the gutter, frozen to death.

Dead! Buried in the potter's field, unhonored, unwept— Unwept, did I say?

Ah, no. A thousand miles away in the old homestead the white-haired mother weeps for her erring, wandering boy, and prays that she may be spared to see his dear face once more. Years ago he wandered away and she has lost all trace of him. Every night since he left she has prayed the good God to help him and bring him back again to the home he used to love so well. But he will never come. Thank God, she will never know that the last night he spent on earth he was kicked from the place of his ruin, a vagabond, into the street. She will never know that with the cry of "Lost! Lost! Lost!" echoing through the chambers of his soul, he sank into the gutter, and his life currents froze where he fell. God be praised, this cup of sorrow she shall not drink!

Young man, take your choice—temperance or intemperance. Temperance is a virtue; intemperance a vice. Temperance brings prosperity; intemperance adversity. Temperance gives joy, peace and comfort; intemperance sorrow, trouble and want. Temperance brings strength of body and mind, a rugged life, a hale old age; intemperance a polluted body, a feeble mind, a wretched life and a besotted old age, filled with a thousand unspeakable woes. Temperance is a blooming flower; intemperance a piercing thorn. Temperance is an orange tree, rich with a crown of golden fruit; intemperance a barren tree withered in leaf and branch. Temperance is a beautiful virgin with an angel's face; intemperance a painted harlot. Temperance is honor; intemperance dishonor. Temperance is divine; intemperance brutal. Temperanec is lovely; intemperance hateful. The one makes the heart leap for joy, the other creates a hell in the human breast.

Look upon this sad picture of a wasted life and dreadful death, and then, young man, take your choice. —A. B. Campbell, in National Advocate.

A Successful Experiment.

The good condition and good behavior of the troops in South Africa is recognized as largely due to the fact that they have had no strong drink. Gen. Kelly, L. A. G., said lately to a newspaper correspondent: "This campaign has been run entirely on teetotal principles, and the experiment has proved wonderfully successful."

BANANA PLANTERS COMPLAIN.

Fruit Rotting Along the Monkey River, Honduras, and No Steamships to Carry It.

The Clarion, a newspaper published at Belize, British Honduras, gives voice to the troubles of the banana planters on the Monkey river, south of that port. They depend wholly upon the banana crop for a livelihood. The Mobile Steamship Company has for six years been running a fortnightly service to the river which has been its chief source of banana supply, but to-day its vessels are steaming past the port and buying their cargoes in the harbors of Guatemala and Honduras, leaving the Monkey river planters in the lurch, says the New York Sun.

So the planters are writing letters telling of their grievances. They say the steamship company has heretofore paid a fair price and everything has been satisfactory. In September, however, the company confronted the planters with a contract and told them they must sign it or the service would be discontinued. The planters say the proposed contract so changes the classification of fruit that they would be robbed of a third of their income if they assented to it. They told the company they would not sign, and now they sit on the wharf, where the fruit is rotting, and see the steamers pass by in the offing on the way to the republics south of them to load up with bananas for the American market.

The planters are tasting the bitterness of having commodities to sell without any means of transporting them to market. They say they will not sign the contract, for it means ruin, and they will not assent to injustice. So they appeal to the colonial government to redress their wrong. Why, they ask, did not the government compel the company to ship the fruit of the colony when a contract was given it to carry the mails? What will the government do to secure transportation now that the planters are helpless and living in enforced idleness while their crops are spoiling on their hands? These planters have from 3,000 to 4,000 bunches of bananas to ship every week, and there is work for any steamship company that wants the job.

British Honduras is the least important colony in the British empire. The interior has been little developed and everything has gone in a happy-go-lucky way, just as Belize was named. The English who settled there named the town Wallace. The Spaniards had difficulty in pronouncing the name and they corrupted it to Belice, and later it came to be called Belize. The Englishmen in that warm country were too lethargic to oppose this corruption of the name, and so they lazily acquiesced in the Spanish version of it.

Few regions abound more in natural resources. J. Bellamy wrote 11 years ago: "A remarkable peculiarity of the climate and soil is that almost all the tropical products of commercial value may be grown in the same zone. I have frequently seen maize, rice, bananas, pineapples, oranges, coffee, cacao, cotton, cassava, rubber and cocoanuts all flourishing on the same piece of ground. There is an abundance of fibre-producing plants and a large extent of land suitable for cattle and mule breeding."

The crying need just now is transportation for fruit, and it is to be hoped that some day the development of this neglected corner of the world may be commensurate with its large resources.

THE CHANGE OF LIFE

Is the most important period in a woman's existence. Owing to modern methods of living, not one woman in a thousand approaches this perfectly natural change without experiencing a train of very annoying and sometimes painful symptoms.

Those dreadful hot flashes, sending the blood surging to the heart until it seems ready to burst, and the faint feeling that follows, sometimes with chills, as if the heart were going to stop for good, are symptoms of a dangerous, nervous trouble. Those hot flashes are just so many calls from nature for help. The nerves are crying out for assistance. The cry should be heeded in time. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound was prepared to meet the needs of woman's system at this trying period of her life.

It builds up the weakened nervous system, and enables a woman to pass that grand change triumphantly.

"I was a very sick woman, caused by Change of Life. I suffered with hot flushes, and fainting spells. I was afraid to go on the street, my head and back troubled me so. I was entirely cured by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound."— MRS. JENNIE NOBLE, 5010 Keyser St., Germantown, Pa.

PROTECTING TROUGHS.

Suggestion for a Simple Device by Which Water for Stock Can Be Kept Clean.

Water for stock should be kept clean and cool. A water trough in which ducks have been paddling and on which an August sun has been beating for hours is not an attractive drinking place for animals. Where large tanks supplied from a wind wheel are needed and especially if they are metal tanks, they should be boxed in, a good plan being shown in the engraving. If horse and cattle yards are separated, the tank may occupy a place in the fence between them. The inclosing box is brought in the square to a level with the tank and then roofed over at an angle of from 30 to 45 degrees. At each end a section of the roof is hinged, and may be thrown up against a strip directly over the ridge of the roof, where a U-shaped iron, or a horseshoe, will prevent it falling or being blown down. The separation of these drinking places promotes peaceable relations among the stock while drinking and by keeping the doors closed the water is kept clear and cool in summer, and in winter it helps to prevent hard freezing.—Orange Judd Farmer.

THE PURE FOOD BILL.

A Measure Whose Passage and Rigid Enforcement Will Benefit American Farmers.

It is gratifying to learn that all opposing interests in congress have been unified on a pure food bill and that the measure may become a law soon. Senator Mason and Representative Brosius have now made their respective bills exactly alike, and both branches of congress will support the measure. For two years strenuous efforts have been made to obtain legislation to prevent the adulteration, misbranding and imitation of foods, beverages, candies, drugs and condiments throughout the United States. The Mason-Brosius bill is the final embodiment of these labors and will make a desirable law.

Under this measure it will become the duty of the chemical bureau of the department of agriculture to inspect food and drug products sent to it for that purpose by the various branches of the government. The bill prohibits the shipment of adulterated or misbranded foods or drugs from one state or territory to another or from this country to a foreign nation, under pain of a fine of $200 for the first offense and $300 for succeeding offenses, with imprisonment for one year, at the discretion of the court. Great care has been taken to define exactly the meaning of the terms "adulteration" and "misbranding," so that the law may not be easily evaded. It gives promise of being a businesslike and effective measure for protecting consumers against frauds of this kind.

There has long been urgent need of a federal law against food adulteration. The general government can deal much more effectively with such frauds than can the state or municipal government. It has better facilities for chemical analysis and better legal machinery for bringing offenders to justice. With the present vast development of interstate commerce any matter of food adulteration naturally becomes a national rather than a local question. There is reason to believe that a federal law will accomplish much good in curing existing abuses.—Chicago Tribune.

Sticking to One Thing Pays.

Farmers who stick to the crops and system of farming they have found most profitable in the long run are wisest. The low price of hops last year induced many New York farmers to change to other crops and now they are regretting it. The New York Farmer says: "Hops have doubled in price since the close of the season of 1899. Last year at this time they sold at seven to ten cents in Otsego and other counties have received from 17 to 20 cents a pound for all the good hops they have on hand. Some hop growers turned to potatoes, and lost their season's work by drought. Others tried beans, cabbage and other truck, and probably not one of them all has bettered his condition by turning to other crops. Some of them are decidedly worse off as a consequence of the change."

Rapid Growth of Pigs.

The pig has the reputation of being able to produce a greater weight of meat and in a shorter time from a certain quantity of food than any of our other farm animals, says the Farmers' Advocate. As illustrative of this, it may be mentioned, that while a well fed, comfortably quartered pig will increase in weight at the rate of one pound for every five or six pounds of dry food which it consumes, an ox requires to consume from 12 to 15 or 18 pounds of dry food (depending on the materials used) in order to produce the same weight of meat.

THE ANIMAL MANURES.

A Source of Income Whose Importance Is Underestimated by Many Western Farmers.

Andrew H. Ward, writing very intelligently of conditions in a Boston paper, incidentally makes reference to a fact concerning western methods of agriculture which ought to arouse the farmers in this section to the loss they suffer through treating as a negligible factor the animal manures produced on their farms. He quotes from the report of the Massachusetts state board of agriculture the statement that: "The encouraging feature of the dairy business is the fact that the fertilizers necessary to keep up the fertility of the soil are furnished as a waste product. Experiments of chemists show that the excrements of a well-fed cow in 12 months contain nitrogen, phosphoric acid and potash, worth at the market price of those articles more than $45. This sum is no mean addition to the value of the milk and butter product of the cow. These elements are absolutely necessary to replace what our crops take from the soil, and should be counted as part of the income from the business." Mr. Ward follows this with this statement:

"At the west they do not count this income from the cow, which gives the east a great advantage over the west. It will be somewhat reduced as the market prices of nitrogen, phosphoric acid and potash in fertilizers are lowered by the fertilizer trust now being formed."

This is true of too many of our western farmers who, blessed with soil of wonderful richness, have treated it as though it were a bank which could honor all drafts indefinitely without any deposits being made against them. We are glad to say that this is not true to-day to the extent it was but a few years ago; yet it too correctly describes conditions on a majority of western farms. The reform should come before it is too late; before we of the west are compelled, as were the farmers of the east, to recognize nature's mode of restoring and maintaining soil fertility. For if we wait until that time, we shall have to pay for fertilizers from the products of poor, worn-out farms—a task but one remove from involuntary bondage. Let us learn from the experience of the east and put into practice now the methods which that section has demonstrated will insure the continued productivity of the land.—Farmers' Voice.

WHEAT IMPROVEMENT.

Among the Ordinary Varieties Known at Present Rust Resistance Is Not Obtainable.

In 1894 the division of vegetable physiology and pathology of the United States department of agriculture began experiments on an extensive scale to test the comparative rust resistance of different varieties of cereals, especially wheat. This work was carried on for three seasons, and during that time it became apparent that constant rust resistance is not to be obtained among the ordinary bread wheats known at present, though on an average a few such varieties are fairly resistant during a long period of years. By the results obtained it was rendered highly probable that this quality must be bred into a variety either by rigid selection of the most resistant individuals of that variety or by crossing with resistant varieties of other wheat groups and selecting from the resultant progeny such types as combine in the highest degree the usual qualities of the bread-wheat group with that of rust resistance.

It was also found that in regard to other qualities than rust resistance it is not possible to obtain varieties which even approximate perfection, and it is rare that many desirable qualities are found in the same variety.

It was, therefore, determined to study thoroughly wheat varieties themselves in all relations and investigate all associated problems, such as drought resistance, early maturity, yielding power, and other matters of great economic interest.

WAGON ON RUNNERS.

No Farmer Who Has a Grain of Ingenuity About Him Need Be Without a Good Sled.

These can be easily made by taking off the wheel and putting on a runner. Fig. a shows the hub, made of hard wood and measured so that it will fit on the axle in the place of the wheel hub. Figs. c c are spokes 14 inches long, extending from hub to runner. Holes have to be made for spokes to fit in both hub and runner. They are about 2½ feet long. Fig. d is the runner, 20 inches long, which is strengthened by an iron rod (Fig. b.) The nut used on the wagon or carriage axel may be used to hold on this sleigh hub.—Alfred C. Sealander, in Farm and Home.

A Word About Fertilizers.

Cheap fertilizers are the best for some crops. It is possible that the land may be well supplied with nitrogen from the growing on the soil of clover or cow peas. The farmer will then need only potash and phosphoric acid, which can be purchased for about five cents per pound. As nitrogen sells for about 15 cents per pound, its cost is three times as much as the other substances. The cheap fertilizers are therefore the most efficient according to circumstances.

WHEELER WAS TOO POLITE.

Embarrassing Dilemma in Which "Fighting Joe" Lately Found Himself.

At Washington the other day it was raining hard, and the street cars were crowded with passengers more or less bedraggled. Among them was Gen. Joe Wheeler. Next to him was a woman wearing a mackintosh, who rose to get off at Fourteenth and F streets. Gen. Wheeler noticed an umbrella leaning against the car seat.

He grabbed the umbrella, ran after the woman, caught her at the door and said: "Pardon me, madam, but you left your umbrella."

The woman looked puzzled, but took the umbrella. Gen. Wheeler resumed his seat. Then a woman on the other side of him gave a little scream and said: "Why, you nasty little man, you gave that woman my umbrella." Then she appealed to the conductor.

Gen. Wheeler apologized, but the woman said: "Now you just get right off the car and get it for me or I'll notify the police."

Meekly the veteran of three wars tumbled off into the rain and ran after the woman with the mackintosh. He made a hurried explanation, got the umbrella and rushed back to the waiting car.

As he handed it back to its owner he said: "I trust you will pardon me, madam. I assure you it was all a mistake."

The woman glared at him. "I don't know about that," she sniffed. "I don't believe you are any better than you ought to be."

"What's the difference whether I'm engaged to her or not?" asked the customer, with considerable tartness.

"A great deal, sir. You intend this ring for a Christmas present, probably?"

"I probably do."

"Very well. We have diamond rings for $25 and diamond rings for $50, $75 and $100. If not actually engaged to the girl, take a $25 ring, and when she brings it in here to find out the cost we'll lie $50 worth for your benefit. Grade Doses by Rank.

One Marshal Le Febvre fell ill of an ague, and his servant, an old soldier, caught the malady at the same time. The servant was quickly cured, but the fever clung to the marshal until it occurred to his energetic duchess that the doctor had blundered by giving the marshal the same doses as to a private soldier. She rapidly counted upon her fingers the different rings of the military ladder. "Here, drink this; this is suited to your grade," she said, putting a tumbler to her husband's lips. And the duke, having swallowed a dozen doses at one gulp, was soon on his legs again. "You've a great deal to learn, my boy," was the lady's subsequent remark to the astonished doctor.—Chicago Chronicle.

Where Physicians Failed.

When I. W. Kesler was a general news agent at 524 Front Street, Cincinnati, Ohio, he wrote: "Palmer's Lotion has cured a very distressing and unsightly eruption on my face of over two years' standing, after the best physicians I could find failed in affording me any relief. The first application removed much of the soreness and pain, and very soon a complete cure was effected." In all such cases Palmer's Lotion Soap should be used in preference to any other. PRESBYTERIAN PASTOR PRAISES PE-RU-NA.

First Presbyterian Church of Greensboro, Ga., and Its Pastor and Elder.

THE day was when men of prominence hesitated to give their testimonials to proprietary medicines for publication. This remains trus to-day of most proprietary medicines. But Peruna has become so justly famous, its merits are known to so many people of high and low stations, that no one hesitates to see his name in print recommending Peruna.

The highest men in our nation have given Peruna a strong endorsement. Men representing all classes and stations are equally represented.

A dignified representative of the Presbyterian church in the person of Rev. E. G. Smith does not hesitate to state publicly that he has used Peruna in his family and found it cured when other remedies failed. In this statement the Rev. Smith is supported by an elder in his church.

Rev. E. G. Smith, pastor of the Presbyterian church of Greensboro, Ga., writes:

"Having used Peruna in my family for some time it gives me pleasure to testify to its true worth. My little boy seven years of age had been suffering for some time with catarrh of the lower bowels. Other remedies had failed, but after taking two bottles of Peruna the trouble almost entirely disappeared. For this special malady I consider it well nigh a specific. As a tonic for weak and worn out people it has few or no equals."—Rev. E. G. Smith.

Mr. M. J. Rossman, a prominent merchant of Greensboro, Ga., and an elder in the Presbyterian church of that place, has used Peruna, and in a recent letter to The Peruna Medicine Co., of Columbus, Ohio, writes as follows:

"For a long time I was troubled with catarrh of the kidneys and tried many remedies, all of which gave me no relief. Peruna was recommended to me by several friends, and after using a few bottles I am pleased to say that the long looked for relief was found and I am now enjoying better health than I have for years, and can heartily recommend Peruna to all similarly afflicted. It is certainly a grand medicine."—M. J. Rossman.

If you do not derive prompt and satisfactory results from the use of Peruna, write at once to Dr. Hartman, giving a full statement of your case and he will be pleased to give you his valuable advice gratis.

Mr. Bryan's Farewell.

Mr. Bryan, like the late Cardinal Wolsey, bids, with tears in his eyes, farewell, a long farewell, to all his greatness. To some it might seem more accurate to say his dreams or his hopes of greatness. We are not sure, however, that the greatness of candidacy, of diurnally posing before the public eye and of making his own personality the paramount issue of a once great party's campaign, was not to him a greatness almost as satisfying as actual accession to the Presidency would be to others. Unlike Wolsey, however, in his lament he casts chief blame not on his own misguided zeal, his misplaced confidence and his high blown pride and ambition, but rather upon the treacherous desertion of his cause by Democratic leaders. It was because they would not follow him that defeat came. The men who were Democratic standard bearers before he was known even as a boy orator declined to bow even to his imperious will. Hence Mr. Bryan's tears. It is quite true that they did not follow him, but it may be doubted whether they were therefore guilty of desertion. "Indian not lost!" exclaimed the wandering savage. "Wigwam lost. Tribe lost. Indian not lost. Indian here!" It is the role of that Indian which Mr. Bryan has assumed.

Mr. Bryan has apparently never recognized, and now in his farewell scene does not recognize, his own radical departure from Democratic principals and his own surrender—in another case he might call it treacherous—to Populism, Socialism and Anarchy. His fondness for quoting from Jefferson seems to indicate that he regards himself as being the custodian of the true Democratic faith, once delivered and ever since kept unchanged. He seems to be still blind to the fact, so obvious to the vast majority of his fellow citizens, that almost every one of his paramount issues is directly opposed to the traditions and practice of the Democratic party. His opposition to National growth and expansion, his efforts to cripple and circumscribe governmental authority, his assault upon the integrity and independence of the judiciary, his campaign against sound money and National credit, his incendiary appeals to class hatreds, are all directly contrary to the precept and example of his gratest predecessors in Democratic leadership. The real Democrats did not desert him. He wandered away from them. The tribe and the wigman are where they were. It is the one lone Indian who is wandering in the wilderness, protesting that it is not he but the wigwam that is lost.

Mr. Bryan fails, also, to realize how he himself has played the part of a trimmer. When the war fever swept the land and brass buttons were badges of popularity he hastened to seek a commission and to raise a regiment, and then with the return of peace took up the burden of his prophecy against the sins and the menace of militarism. When the nation was rejoicing in the Treaty of Paris he put himself forward as the advocate of its ratification; yet a few months later he organized the extremest antagonism to the fulfilment of its terms. He inveighed against trusts, yet he hobnobbed and co-operated with and sought the support of the heads of some of the most offensive trusts in existence. He declaimed austerely against corruption, yet in the very heyday of red light debauchery he made himself the sworn blood comrade of the high priests of iniquity, and effusively and ostentatiously proclaimed that "Great is Tammany, and Croker is its prophet!" These are the things that alienated Mr. Bryan from the best men of light and leading in the Democratic party, which assured his defeat, and which now compel even himself to recognize his deposition from the headship of the party. They may not be pleasant to recall. But the simple truth of history requires them to be taken into consideration as the forerunners and the causes of Mr. Bryan's lachrymose farewell.

"Slick Vic."

Col. L. Victor Baughman, "Slick Vic," is anxious for the disfranchisement of voters in this State. This is easy to understand. Mr. Baughman wants to run for governor on the Democratic ticket and he realizes, with his record hanging over him, that it is utterly impossible for him to win unless he resorts to some unusual piece of political jugglery. He is famous for those sort of things. He is a keen manipulator and a consciousless politician. His record shows that nothing is allowed to stand in the way of his political aspirations, and just now he seems to be filled with a mad desire to be elected to a State office. To accomplish this he would disfranchise voters. The Democratic machine has made a saturnalia of the State affairs since its return to power. The people of the State are thoroughly disgusted, and the ring knows that its doom is sealed unless something drastic is done.

The people feel safe, however, and know that the assaults of political autocrats like Baughman, the product of the Democratic machine, on their rights and liberties will prove futile.

ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA.

Interesting Sketch of This Historic Old Town on the Potomac.

To the Editor of The Republican.

Some other cities may perchance have gained higher sounding names by reason of important events recorded in their histories, but there are very few cities that furnish more of real interest to the studious tourist than quaint Alexandria of Old Virginia. It is situated upon a lovely incline forming the western bank of the Potomac river about seven miles below Washington City. Strangers who visit Washington now-a-days and fail to see Alexandria may be classed with those who visit Egypt and fail to see the Pyramids or the Sphinx.

In 1608 the surpassing beauty of its long green slope attracted the landing of Capt. John Smith, the pioneer governor of Jamestown, while exploring for a northwest passage to the Pacific Ocean. He was the first white man to admire the scene. The other attractions of the river and its palisades enticed him no further north. The fertility of its soil attracted the tobacco planters of St. Mary's at the mouth of the river when religious dissensions destroyed that colony in 1634 and it was then named Bell Haven. It grew in wealth more than in population. Every dwelling was indeed a castle surrounded by a fortress-like wall made of imported English bricks, which remain strictly in evidence to this day. It was then a city of luxury and commerce. It attracted many capitalists and brooked no rival on the Chesapeake.

Recently while sight-seeing we paid our respects to Alexandria. We alighted from the car upon our arrival where once stood the Marshall House. It was during the early days of the civil war that James Jackson, the proprietor, hoisted a Confederate flag over the hotel. Colonel Ellsworth proceeded to haul it down, but when he descended to the foot of the stairs he was instantly killed by the discharge of a double-barrel shot gun in the hands of Jackson. In a breath Jackson was slain by Federal soldiers. Now Virginia is full of Jacksons who claim to belong to the F. F. V.'s and point with exultant pride to James Jackson as their distinguished ancestor of noble blood.

Alexandria was one of the seats of Confederate sympathy. Only one square from the Mansion House we saw a monument of Barry granite crowned with a bronze statue of a Confederate soldier and dedicated to the memory of the Confederate dead May 24, 1889. It is inscribed as follows:

"They died in the consciousness of duty faithfully performed."

Christ church is a relic of sacred interest. It was built in 1773 of bricks imported from England. Washington attended this church, was a vestryman and paid $160 annually for his pew which is kept cushioned and carefully preserved. Services are held in this church every Sunday. On the left of the altar is a marble tablet on which is inscribed: "To the memory of George Washington," and on the right of the altar is another tablet inscribed: "To the memory of Robert E. Lee." Lee was christened in this church.

From the church we proceeded to the Masonic lodge room. Here Washington's Masonic relics are kept. He was Master of the lodge here when he officiated at the laying of the corner stone of the Capitol building at Washington.

Across the street we find the Braddock House. In 1689 the British built a formidable fortress here of imported stone for protection against the French and Indians and also to command the river, which at this point is about one mile wide. The eastern wall formed the bank of the river from which was the main entrance. Here a British boat containing 24 soldiers upset and all were drowned. On the left of the river entrance we find inside the wall two dungeons still intact. They are perhaps eight feet high in the centre and in shape they remind one of a stone arch over a small ravine. They have damp walls, dirt floors, and each has an opening at the top large enough to admit rain and light, but not large enough to permit a prisoner to escape. No doubt they are on a par with the dungeons of the Bastile which were battered down July 14, 1789, during the French revolution. Leading from the fortress to the water on the north side is a deep underground passage to enable the defendants to escape unseen if necessary.

This fortress became the private property of a wealthy retired merchant named John Carlysle, who in 1732 built upon the western end what is called the Carlysle Mansion or Braddock Headquarters, surpassing in richness and convenience nearly all other mansions then in Alexandria. During the summer of 1755 General Braddock occupied this house for his army headquarters while he drilled his 2000 Virginia Provincials previous to his memorable defeat at Fort Du Quesne (Pittsburg, Pa.), where he was killed and buried.

After the American Revolution Alexandria discovered that her runious commercial rival was Baltimore. Her commerce began to wane and she saw her doom in the Egyptian City from which she derived her name.

To aid in reviving the prosperity of Alexandria men of wealth purchased the Carlysle Mansion and built around it on three sides an extensive hotel, known as the Braddock House. At the door of this hotel we were met by an African descendant of gingerbread complexion. He bowed graciously and informed us that "The Braddock headquarters is in the cote (court) of the hotel." When we entered the court we gazed upon the Carlysle Mansion with amazement. Where can be found another such a structure built when it was? It is a strange relict. The material was prepared in England. All the pieces were numbered so that they could be put together with scarcely the sound of a hammer.

The odor one finds and the imported material one sees makes the visitor feel that he is in a foreign country. Upon the first entrance we find ourselves in a spacious hall. The guide opened the door on the left and we entered the Blue Room. This was Gen. Braddock's office. In this room he met five governors and planned his campaign against the French and Indians. In this room Washington at the age of fifteen received his first commission. There were no stoves in those days and the fireplace in which the cooking was done was large enough to contain an upright piano. Adjoining the Blue Room is a bed chamber containing a bureau—the only piece of Braddock furniture. Across the hall we were shown a large double parlor connected by folding doors. In these parlors we were informed that Washington in his youth first met and danced the graceful minuet with the charming daughter of Lord Fairfax.

The mahogany stairway leading to the second floor is very wide. Up stairs we found five rooms provided with call bells for servants. In the basement we found that at one time some of the subdivisions of the abandoned fortress had been used for smoke-house, kitchen, wine-rooms, etc.

When we returned to the street we paused to look at that weather beaten hotel which for fifty years had been the most popular hotel in Northern Virginia.

One of the events, somewhat connected with this hotel, is so shrouded in mystery that it would perhaps be regarded as a myth if it were not for a certain grave in St. Paul's cemetery, one-half mile distant, called "The Female Stranger." A remarkable story regarding this grave has been handed down to the present generation. According to this legend a vessel from Halifax landed at Alexandria in the summer of 1816. Among the passengers were a man and woman who took lodging at the Braddock House. She was very ill and they called in the leading physician of Alexandria to treat her but she died and was buried in St. Paul's cemetery. A large tablet resting upon a very substantial foundation marks her grave, enclosed with a wide granite coping at one time mounted with a heavy iron railing. At the head of the grave is a dead willow tree. The tablet inscribed is as follows:

"TO THE MEMORY OF A
FEMALE STRANGER.
Whose mortal sufferings terminated on the 4th day of October, 1816, age 23 years and 8 months.

This stone is erected by her disconsolate husband in whose arms she breathed out her last sigh and who under God did his utmost to sooth the cold, dull ear of death.

How loved, how honored once avails thee not
To whom related or by whom begot:
A heap of dust alone remains of thee,
'Tis all thou art and all the proud shall be."

The husband after erecting this costly and conspicuous contribution to his wife's memory, took his departure without disclosing a word regarding himself or his ill-fated wife. Who they were and where they came from is as mysterious now as then. His care of her and the costly memorial he placed at her tomb indicate that he possessed a strong intellect and also wealth.

It has been surmised that they were a runaway bride and groom who intended that her fate should never be discovered by their friends.

A. U. REVOIR.

THE BEST THEY KNOW.

YOU remember the old lady who rode for the first time on a railway train. There was a frightful collision, but when the rescuers reached her she was quite calm. She said she supposed they always stopped that way. The story well illustrates why so many women are satisfied to live without Ivory Soap. They have never tried it! Naturally enough, they think that annoying odors, sharp chemicals, and wasteful greasiness are common to all soaps.

Rheumatism.

Nobody knows all about it; and nothing, now known, will always cure it.

Doctors try Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil, when they think it is caused by imperfect digestion of food. You can do the same.

It may or may not be caused by the failure of stomach and bowels to do their work. If it is, you will cure it; if not, you will do no harm.

The way, to cure a disease is to stop its cause, and help the body get back to its habit of health.

When Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil does that, it cures; when it don't, it don't cure. It never does harm.

The genuine has this picture on it, take no other.

If you have not tried it, send for free sample, its agreeable taste will surprise you.

The uses of the telephone are multiplying every day, and the newest thing is to use them as a kind of alarm clock. When a man wants to take an early train he says to Central before going to bed, "ring me up at five in the morning," and central puts him "on call" for that hour just as they do with their guests at a hotel. It is not much trouble to central, who is on duty all night and it is a great convenience to the traveler who has no alarm clock.

A Boston merchant has written to a leading newspaper that he has found newspaper advertising a "successful experiment." As a matter of fact it is not an experiment, but a common sense branch of business enterprise. Advertising began when the first salesman spoke favorably of his wares and business methods, and when goods were first placed on display to attract the attention of the public. Newspaper advertising is simply an extension of the salesman's talk, so that it may reach thousands of possible buyers.

The center of population of the United States, as determined from the figures of the last census, appears to be in Southern Indiana, a slight shift to the westward having been made in the past ten years. Of course this is a purely imaginary center which shifts with every succeeding census, but it is rather odd to note that the population of Southern Indiana is not at all dense; on the other hand, it is considerably scattered, that is when compared with the many densely populated districts of the country, or those districts which lay claim to being "centers of population."

Hon. A. F. George's Residence Burned.

Hon. A. F. George, of near Swanton, was in Oakland Monday purchasing household goods to take the place of those consumed Sunday morning about nine o'clock, at which time his residence with its entire contents except an organ, sewing machine and one chair, was burned to the ground.

The fire originated in the attic of the building and the first intimation that Mr. George and his family had of the state of affairs was when something fell from the attic to the floor beneath which attracted their attention and upon investigating it was found that the entire building above the second floor was a mass of flames. Seeing that nothing could save the house Mr. George set about removing his furniture but succeeded in saving very little. Besides the furniture lost in the fire the wardrobes of the entire family and a well selected and very valuable library was consumed.

Being left with neither house or clothing Mr. George's neighbors tendered their assistance and the family was made very comfortable. A house near the one burned has been secured by Mr. George and he will soon be "at home" again. The insurance carried was $1,000 which covers about half the loss sustained.

Death of John J. Brenneman.

The community of Bittinger, in the death of the venerable John J. Brenneman, which occured on Thursday last, the 17th inst., lost one of its most valuable and respected citizens. Mr. Brenneman was one of a large family and was born more than seventy years ago. He was a member of the Amish church and a thorough Christian being of a genial nature, kindly disposed and lending a helping hand to all who sought relief. His funeral took place on Saturday, the interment being made on his farm—"Cherry Tree Meadows," one of the best kept and most highly cultivated pieces of land in the county.

Don't Want Him Hung.

A petition is being circulated at Kingwood praying Governor Atkinson to commute to life imprisonment the sentence imposed upon J. Wesley Beatty for the killing of David A. Nine. The petition sets forth the good character of the condemned man previous to the one act which laid him liable to the death penalty, his influence as a good citizen and his connection with the church and his family. The paper is a very strong one and is being widely circulated by his friends.

Newspaper men generally capitalize the word "Heaven," while its antithesis, "hell is printed in lower case. There appears to be some philosophy underlying this. The newspaper man thinks it best to leave capitalization of the lower region alone. He may get there some time—on a visit, of course—and be able to capitalize the whole outfit with dues collected from delinquent subscribers who invariably take up their abode in the hot climate.

OBITUARY.

John H. Barnard.

John H., son of Otho and Martha A. Barnard, died January 12, 1901, at his home near Chestnut Grove, of an abcess resulting from typhoid fever, which he contracted in July. The deceased was in his 22nd year, had just budded into manhood.

The funeral sermon was preached by Rev. J. H. Howard, of Bloomington, to one of the largest concourse of friends and relatives ever seen on a like occasion. The community has met with such a loss that it cannot soon recover, as John was one of the very best young men. He was a living example—sober, quiet and industrious at all times. About ten days before his death, when the abcess opened, he told his mother, who was waiting on him at the time, that he was ready to die and requested that his sister, who was absent, meet him in heaven.

We would say to the parents, brothers and sisters, weep not as those who have no hope.

Dearest Johnny, thou hath left us,
And thy loss we deeply feel;
But 'tis God who hath bereft us—
He will all your sorrows heal.

Wherefore should we make our moan
Now your darling boy is dead?
He to early rest is gone;
He to Paradise is fled.
You can go to him but he Never can return to thee.

Rasin Paid Over $19,000.

Mr. I. Freeman Rasin, of Baltimore, on Monday paid over to the state the $19,000 recovered against him for interest on the state's money which he had received, by the judgment entered in Baltimore on Saturday. Two other suits are still pending against other officers of the Baltimore city courts, for interest on their deposits. Their practice was to deposit the state funds in a bank receiving two per cent. interest theron, and to keep the interest, which accrued while there and before they paid it over to the state.

When Mr. Goldsborough became comptroller and was informed of this practice, he made claim against these officials for this interest and employed Messrs. Geo. R. Gaither, Benjamin A. Richmond and Edgar H. Gans to bring suit for it. Suits were brought by these gentlemen, resulting so far in the recovery of $19,000. No doubt recovery will also be had in the other cases.

Died.

MAY.—At the residence of his son, Chas. S. May at Swanton, at 3 a. m. Wednesday, D. L. May, of Everett, Pa. The deceased was aged about 69 years. His remains were taken to Everett for interment, where they were accompanied by Mrs. May and other relatives.

HIRAM'S FAM'LY TREE.

I recolleck when I wuz young
I clum an apple tree,
An' all ter once a lim' cracked off
An' fell, ker smack! with me.
One min'it I wuz feelin' smart
Away up in the air;
The nex', I dropped. I swan! I felt
Right foolish lyin' there.

Well, when Hi Muggins' cousin Tom,
Down York way, struck it rich,
An' went an' wed a city gal
With ancestors an' sich,
Hi Muggins sez: "Dum blaze my hide!
Her folks can't outdo me;
Ef they kin sport a coat o' arms
I'll hev a fam'ly tree!"

So Hiram he begun ter climb
An' sort o' raise the dead
A-nosin' round' in dockyments
An' graveyards, "fer," he said,
"That's where a feller's got ter hunt
Ter find his pedigree;
They're sort o' branches thet you use
Ter climb yer fam'ly tree."

The more thet Hiram hunted out
O' them dead kin o' his
The more Hi's notion o' the wuth
O' Hiram Muggins riz;
An' when he found thet his great-great-
Gran'dad hed crossed the sea
In seventeen-ten, he sot an' crowed.
Up in his fam'ly tree.

Et galled me some ter see his airs,
But all I sez was: "Hi,
I reckon she's a good stout tree,
But don't you climb too high."
But Hi sez: "Shucks! These I've found
Ain't none o' high degree,
I've got an idee there's a king
A-top my fam'ly tree."

Well, He he writ ter England where
His grandad's grandad's pa
Hed lived, an' when his letter went
He most talked off his jaw,
A-tellin' us poor common folks
How happy he wud be
When he got word some earl or dook
Wuz on his fam'ly tree.

Hi he hed clum plum out o' sight
An' then there come one day
A letter, an' et sez: "We've looked
An' we regret ter say
Thet Obadiah Muggins wuz,
In sixteen ninety-three,
A-caught a-stealin' money
An' hung up on Tyburn tree."

So thet's how come thet Hiram is
So meek an' lowly now;
Becuz he kep' a clim'in'
Till he struck a rotten bough,
An' fell so hard et mashed him flat;
Thet's why et seems ter me
Et's risky fer us common folks
Ter climb a fam'ly tree.

THE HOODWINKING OF FERNANDO

By Mrs. L. M. Terry.

WHEN rich old Don Antonio Jesus Maria del Valle, the wealthiest mine owner in Morelos, reluctantly departed this life, being assisted thereto by most of the physicians in the state, and all the prominent bishops and priests, his only child and heiress, pretty Ynez, was left to the guardianship of her aunt, grim Dona Antonia.

Heartbroken as she was at being thus left an orphan, for her pretty American mother had died years before, Ynez felt that being thus left to the tender mercies of her aunt was the unkindest cut of all. Everyone else thought so, too; everyone, from John Ward down, pitied the girl, and so for that matter would you, did you happen to have the extreme ill-luck of knowing that belligerent dame, Dona Antonia del Valle.

Tall and masculine in port, heavily mustached, as regards face, and made up, as to mental powers, of a combination of three parts utter intolerance and another part fanaticism and bigotry, Dona Antonia knew two ruling passions, an intense love of money, and an overpowering hatred of Americans. Had you given the dona her choice between going to hell and consorting there with the devil and his tribe, or to America and the Americans, she would have cheerfully selected the former sulphurous place. People said there was a reason for the old woman's detestation for foreigners. As a very young and beautiful girl, she had been engaged to, and deeply in love with, a young lieutenant. He was killed afterward in that very unequal and unjust war between Mexico and America. The shock of his death had left Dona Antonia a totally different woman, and her love for Lieut. Coronado had straightway changed into a terrible hatred toward the nation at whose door her lover's death lay.

Such being the case, imagine Dona Anontia's feelings when her only brother took unto himself as wife a pretty, fair-haired American woman. She neither forgave nor spoke to the couple during the short years of their married life, though living in the same town with them. Only upon the death of her sister-in-law did Dona Antonia condescend to even notice her brother, and only when he lay upon his dying bed did she so far unbend as to enter his house. Once there, however, so effectively did she work upon his feelings as to induce him to appoint her Ynez's sole guardian. Not that Dona Antonia loved the daughter of the American woman—far from it. She merely wished to direct the life and fate of the girl, who, after all, was a Del Valle and the last of her name. "There will be no more hated Americanos now," thought the dona, grimly. She would see to it that the last of the Del Valles made a fitting marriage with one of her own class and race, an old man—un hombre serio—preferably. As for that vile gringo at the "Mina de Buena Vista" (for so did she designate John Ward, manager of the Buena Vista mine), she would far rather see Ynez dead or in a convent than married to the American.

Which you will agree was certainly hard lines on poor Ynez, who had received a half American education, and was at heart far more American than Mexican. Also it was hard on young Ward, who had never loved before he met the Mexican miner's lovely daughter, and who therefore had all the harder attack. Neither of the young people was very tractable, nor inclined to give in to the bigoted old woman, whose only objection to Ward was that he belonged to the race she haated. For they continued to meet, as of yore, while Dona Antonia was settling several of her departed brother's affairs. When she discovered that the two were still seeing each other daily, in spite of her commands to the contrary, her rage was something terrible. Young Ward was forbidden the house, and poor Ynez, struggling and in tears, was forcibly dragged to her room, where she was kept captive on bread and water until her better senses returned, and she gave her oath to see no more of the gringo, and to marry, instead, the husband selected for her by her Aunt Antonia.

This latter dignitary had been fixed upon by the overbearing aunt, and if anything more could have been possible for the discomfiture of hapless Ynez, this choice would have settled it. For Don Fernando Casaneuva, a dyed-in-the-wool old reprobate, owned to at least 60 years of age. He had been twice married, both luckless spouses dying from the pure misery of being wived to him. A life of absolute profligacy had left him a wreck, both morally and physically, and, worst of all, he was really desperately in love with the pretty heiress of his old companero. So ugly, yellow and wrinkled was he that even Dona Antonia perforce had to admit that Fernando was not very good looking; but, after all, women did not marry for that. Rather should a modest, sensible muchacha select for her husband and the guardian of her fortune an experienced man of certain age. Was not "el buen Fernando" a devoted Romanist, who weekly confessed to no less a person than the bishop himself? Was he not of noble birth, own cousin to the great house of Del Valle? Was he not said to have great influence with the president himself, and was he not worth at least half a million pesos? All these things being true, what more, in the name of Dios and the Virgen, could any woman desire or expect? And, at any rate, willing or not, her niece, la senorita Ynez del Valle, might as well make up her mind to marry Don Fernando Casaneuva or betake herself to a nunnery.

Tears, prayers, expostulations—nothing, in fact—had any effect on the hard-hearted aunt. No, there was not another word to be said. Her niece would marry according to her guardian's desire, or enter a convent. Meanwhile, until a choice was made, confinement in her room, on a very slim diet, would be in order. So, as Senorita del Valle could not and would not hear reason, or be guided thereby, in her room did she remain for several days, weeping a great deal, and storming at her implacable aunt a great deal more. For Senorita Ynez had a good, hot temper, and a strong American will of her own, and she was determined that only by force would she be dragged to the altar with old Casanueva.

Her room, locked and barred as to doors, and grated as to windows, was on the second floor, and even if her balconies were so strongly grated that she could not escape through them, small notes to John—her John—could. Wherefore many billet-doux fluttered down by night to the raging lover beneath, and the situation, in all its exasperating hopelessness, was laid before him. What was to be done?

One unfortunate night, however, Senorita Ynez was discovered in the very act of letting down a note to her gringo lover—she had first drawn up one from him on a cord which they used for the purpose. Of this letter, Dona Antonio knew nothing; enough to realize that this shameless, American-hearted girl had once more defied and gotten the best of her. Wild and furious were the words of dona, who swore that her niece, since she would not consent to marriage with that good caballero, Don Fernando, should be sent without delay to a nunnery which she had in view—a place where shameless girls were soon brought to a realizing sense of their own thanklessness and wickedness, where, above all, there would be no fortune-seeking gringos hanging around.

Dona Antonia's tirade necessarily interrupted, on account of a momentary lack of breath, gave her niece an opportunity to put in a few calm and contemptuous words: "It is not necessary, my aunt. For I have decided already to accept Don Fernando. This prison life is no longer endurable."

For a time, Dona Antonia could hardly believe her ears. Was it possible that the girl could mean what she said? After all her objections, was she at last consenting, and in good faith, to marry Don Fernando? As a realization of what it meant—for her dead brother's fortune was strictly tied up in the hands of the executors, and Don Fernando had offered a good sum in cash for Ynez's consent to his suit—came over the dona, she could have wept with relief. All the same she was careful to let Ynez know that until her marriage day itself was over with, she would be strictly watched and guarded. There was to be, as she expressed it, no gringo-like games played, no deceiving of Don Fernando. Therefore it behooved the senorita to be particularly circumspect.

So that Ynez, being off with the old love could now afford to be on with the new. And the enraptured old Fernando lost no time in "playing the bear" to his pretty young inamorata, who, even as her aunt had threatened, was as strictly looked after and guarded as ever. Every afternoon, at the time of the Angelus, the old don would appear tottering up the street, his servants accompanying him so as to direct the half-blind suitor to the right house. Then, this naturally somewhat weighty matter settled, the servant would retire, leaving Don Fernando to his own devices.

Anyone who knows Mexico will remember that very quaint custom of Mexican lovers—"playing the bear." In her balcony stands the adored, half or wholly sheltered by vines or curtains, while below in the street, on the pavement directly under her or across from her (according to circumstances), paces the adorer. No word is spoken. She stands in the shadow, moving or fluttering a handkerchief occasionally, her face hidden by her lace mantilla, while the don below, pacing up and down, gazes upward with amorous mien, saying more with his eyes, perhaps, than he could with his tongue had he the chance.

In this manner did rheumatic old Don Fernando disport himself, evening after evening, until his poor old bones must have creaked, and his poor stiff old neck must have had innumerable "cricks" in it. But he kept it up nobly; it would not last very much longer, anyway, and the pleasure of seeing his lady-love on her balcony, montionless in her white gown and black mantilla, was quite enough to repay him. After he got her safely, she should be amply repaid for the long delay and the manner in which she had denied his suit.

Ynez, meanwhile, took things quietly, sewing a little in her own room, and trying on patiently the magnificent trousseau which Dona Antonia was having made for her, and for which Don Fernando—as per the usual Mexican custom—would foot the bills. Some of the Mexican customs are beyond improvement; this is one of them.

To see that her bird did not escape, Dona Antonia kept the room locked invariably, and on the rare occasions that the girl went to mass, escorted her in person, with a guard of two servants. She had dealt with refractory Spanish girls before, but this one was half American; one had to be extraordinarily careful. As time went on, however, the old woman grew a little less cautious. For example, at the hour when Don Fernando appeared to "play bear," and she had seen Ynez safely stationed in the barred balcony, with both doors locked, Dona Antonia would go across the street to have a chocolate and gossip with an old friend of hers. From the place where she sat with her friend she could see the girl's dim form and fluttering draperies out on the balcony, and could watch Don Fernando as he tottered up and down beneath her, now mopping his tired face and now and then casting up amorous glances at his bride-elect above. Knowing full well whom she had to deal with, and even in spite of the fact that the keys of Ynez' room were in her pocket, the dona never removed her eyes from the white figure in the balcony. So long as it was there things were all right.

One day—one fatal day—Dona Antonia left her niece a little earlier than usual, having to see a certain modiste; later, she would go to see her crony, as usual. Ynez, at the time of her departure, was busily trying a new white gown on a new-fangled American dress form. So occupied was she with her work that she did not even seem to hear her aunt as she withdrew, closing and locking the door, taking the heavy keys in her hand. Three minutes later the girl did hear the heavy Spanish street door swing to below, and knew that she had at least five minutes' respite before Don Fernando arrived on the street below for his "bear-playing" act.

With trembling hands she dragged the white-robed dress form close to the balcony, twisting a heavy black mantilla about the neck and pinning a fluttering handkerchief to the waist. Then, watching carefully, she slid the cleverly made-up form into the very corner of the heavily-grated balcony, pulling down the curtains and vines so as to conceal the fact that the body had no head. For that matter, she knew well that in the gray dusk neither the dim eyes of her aunt across the street nor the bleary ones of old Fernando below the balcony could see more than the white outline of the figure's skirt.

Then she set to work with a file that she had guarded carefully in her bag of bicycle tools. It was a fiesta day; not a servant remained in the great house; her aunt was safe for more than an hour in the house opposite, and down in the street paced Don Fernando, leering at the dim white figure on the balcony, and thinking fondly of how he would tame the pretty vixen, once she was safely his. Ten minutes' filing did the work; and shortly thereafter Ynez, with her money and jewels hidden safely in a big purse, made a quick flight from the room, down the servants' stairway and out of the back of the house. There, running hurriedly down a back street, she was met by John Ward, who had with him a couple of fleet horses. In half an hour they were "over the border and awa'," and next morning were safely married.

The scene upon Dona Antonia's return I leave you to imagine. The open door and young Ward's file told the story, and she promptly went into violent hysterics. As for Don Fernando, he had an attack of fury when he heard the news that finished his career. And a good riddance of bad rubbish at that, you will doubtless say. —Mrs. L. M. MONEY IN PATENTS.

The Progressive Development of American Inventive Genius.

About One Invention in 25 Pays for the Expense of Patenting It, But Some of Them Reap Considerable Fortunes.

An article by the late E. V. Smalley, in the Century, tells how patents are taken out in Washington, what they cost, and what some of them yield to the inventors.

The progressive development of inventive genius in this country, as indicated by the number of patents issued each year, has been by successive waves rather than by a regular and continuous advance. Taking the first year of each decennial period, we find that in 1880 the number of patents granted was 41; in 1810, 223; in 1820, 155; in 1830, 554; in 1840, 473; in 1850, 995; in 1860, 4,538. The great increase in inventions during the decennial period 1850-60 is a remarkable feature in patent office history. This period was one of rapid national development, and was characterized by the great extension of steam-transportation, the general introduction of the telegraph, and the perfection of the sewing-machine, the reaper, the mower and many other valuable devices. During the civil war the production of patents fell off, but no sooner had the volunteer troops returned to their homes than a wonderful fertility of invention was displayed. Ideas that had been developing in the minds of the soldiers during their life in the camps were put into models by the thousand and sent to Washington. In 1865 the number of patents granted was 6,616, and in 1867 it had run up to 13,026. It remained for a time at about that annual figure, being, in 1870, 13,947; but in 1876, the year of the Centennial exhibition, which powerfully stimulated inventive genius, it reached the highest number yet attained, 17,026. Then there was a steady recession, and by 1880 the patent crop had fallen back to 12,947. Since 1883 the number of patents annually issued has exceeded 20,000. During the calendar year 1899 there were issued 25,527 patents.

One of the old examiners in the patent office estimates that about one invention in 25 repays the cost of taking out a patent. Yet inventors as a class are sanguine men, and no knowledge of the enormous percentage of chances against them will deter them from multiplying ingenious devices. Every one expects a fortune from his particular piece of mechanism. Every one has heard not only of the enormous sums realized from the great inventions of the last half-century, but also of the large returns yielded by things apparently trifling which have struck the public fancy or met the public need. The toy called the returning ball, a small ball attached to an elastic string, is said to have produced a profit of $50,000 a year; the rubber tip on lead-pencils has yielded a competence to the inventor; more than $1,000,000 has been earned by the gimlet-pointed screw, the inventor of which was so poor that he trudged on foot from Philadelphia to Washington to get his patent; the roller-skate has yielded $1,000,000 after the patentee spent $125,000 in England fighting infringements; the dancing Jim Crow is set down for $75,000, and the copper tip for children's shoes at $2,000,000; the spring window-roller pays $100,000 a year, the needle-threader $10,000 a year; from the drive-well $3,000,000 have been realized; the stylographic pen is credited with $100,000 a year; and the egg-beater, the rubber stamp and the marking pad for shading different colors, with large sums. These are only a few examples among hundreds that might be cited. No wonder inventors are hopeful when they reflect that comfort for life and fortune for their children may come from a single fortunate idea.

Buried in a Deep Well.

Two men, or rather a man and a boy, were digging a well in a New Jersey village, when the well caved in, as is not unusual. Being in sandy soil, the precautions had been taken to board the well as it was being sunk, and it happened that the planks fell over the digger, and the sand on the planks. The boy, who was doing the hauling with a bucket and windlass, started to dig out the man, but only succeeded in bringing down more sand. So he ran for help, and, although it looked like a hopeless task, a tunnel was run in a slanting direction, and the digger was rescued alive. He was found huddled up, with his knees touching his chin, in which position he had been for nearly 30 hours.

The Professional Designer.

Just as a man has always depended upon his tailor to make him "the latest," just so women are now coming to depend upon the professional people whose mission it is to dress a woman according to her needs.

It is only a short time since women have learned this secret of good dressing. You can remember, yourself, when a woman boasted that she had designed her own costume. Now you rarely hear such an admission. It is considered so much more chic and even elegant to allow a professional designer to do it for you.

Insomnia Wrecks the Nerves.

Dr. Greene's NERVURA Makes Health.

INSOMNIA is a forerunner of nervous prostration; what organism is strong enough to stand up under the strain of sleepless nights? It is plain that nothing in the world can possibly take the place of restful sleep, yet many try to eke out an existence without this sustaining power. Their nerves are in such a state of tension that sleep is an impossibility, or at best is a series of hideous dreams. It is not strange that physical and mental weakness, amounting soon to complete prostration, follows inability to sleep. There is no let-up to the strain. Vital forces are drawn upon, confirmed invalidism results.

The recuperative power of natural sleep is wonderful. Complete physical and mental exhaustion gives place, after a few hours of quiet slumber, to a full renewal of energy. The fatigue of body and mind disappears entirely while all the muscles are strong and the nerves absolutely calm.

Dr. Greene's NERVURA FOR THE BLOOD AND NERVES.

Sleep is the indication given by Nature as a guide to human plans to restore health. It shows that there are inherent in the wonderful human organism powers of recuperation which must have opportunity to assert themselves. Based on this clear demonstration, Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy was constructed by Dr. Greene to help Nature combat the ills that attack men and women. What no amount of powerful drugs could possibly accomplish, can be successfully and promptly effected by healthy blood and nerves, the kind of blood which flows in strengthening flood to every portion of the body, the condition of nerves which permits awakened Nature to seize its opportunity to restore to perfect health.

Mrs. FLORENCE TAYLOR, of 4 Courtland Place, Bridgeport, Conn., writes:

"For four years I was troubled with nervous debility and hysteria in a most aggravated form. It caused sleeplessness and mental depression, and for months I was confined to my bed. My constitution wasted and I totally lost my appetite. I had many doctors, but they failed to give me any relief. I was advised to try Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy. I was in a terrible condition when I began its use, and almost immediately there was a wonderful change came over me. I regained my appetite, the dizziness in my head departed; it renewed my interest in life and made me feel, in fact, like another person. After taking six bottles I thankfully proclaimed myself strong and well. Those six bottles did for me what hundreds of dollars and numerous physicians failed to do."

Dr. Greene's Nervura is the Remedy that Cures.

PRINCE OF MONACO.

Ruler of Gambling Principality Would Be Free Again.

Therefore He Seeks to Have His Marriage Annulled—His Present Wife the Daughter of a New Orleans Banker.

It is not a divorce which Prince Albert of Monaco is now endeavoring to secure from his American born wife, but an annulment of the marriage, which would not only liberate him from all financial obligations toward her, but, likewise, deprive her of the title of princess of Monaco, besides paving the way to his third marriage with some princess of the blood, the name of the widowed duchess of Aosta, only sister of Princess Louis and Victor Bonaparte, being freely mentioned in connection with this matrimonial project.

The grounds on which the prince is seeking to secure an annulment of his union to the daughter of the New Orleans banker, Michael Heine, are that there was a serious legal flaw in the marriage. His first matrimonial alliance was with Lady Mary Hamilton, sister of the late duke of Hamilton, the wedding taking place in the presence of Emperor Napoleon and Empress Eugenie in Paris.

This marriage was subsequently annulled ecclesiastically by the vatican on the ground that Lady Mary had been forced into the match against her will, the decree at the same time recognizing as legitimate the child born of the union, Prince Louis, who is now heir to the throne of Monaco. This decree was confirmed by the late prince of Monaco in July, 1880.

But Prince Albert's first marriage had been contracted in France while he was still heir apparent, and consequently entitled to no extra territorial privileges, ranking merely as a French nobleman; that is to say, as duke of Mazarin, of Valentinois and of Mayenne. But in 1880 there was no such thing as divorce in the French code, the divorce laws now in existence only coming into operation several years later.

In 1889, says the New York Journal, Prince Albert married, in France, Alice Heine, widow of the French duke of Richelieu, without having taken any steps to have either the vatican decree of his annulment or the Monaco decree of his first marriage recognized and confirmed by the French divorce courts. Indeed, on the register of marriages of the eighth district of Paris, where the second marriage of the prince took place 11 years ago, the word divorce is not mentioned, the only reference to the prince's first wife being a remark that he had previously married Lady Mary Hamilton.

According to French law the prince was, therefore, not free to wed the widowed duchess of Richelieu in 1889 having neglected to take the necessary legal steps to liberate himself from his matrimonial bonds. Hence his second marriage is from the point of view of French law invalid, and even bigamous. It may be argued that the prince as a reigning sovereign is exempt from the jurisdiction of the French courts But the very fact that he should have appealed to the latter to rid him of his American-born wife indicates that he is willing to recognize their competence, in which he is undoubtedly right. For, besides being prince of Monaco, he is, as stated above, a French nobleman and territorial magnate.

Both his marriages have been contracted in France. His principal residence is in Paris, and the principality of Monaco is within both the civil and criminal jurisdiction of the French courts.

The success of the project of the prince is regarded as assured. For by refraining from any opposition the princess will evade the scandal of a divorce suit and the legal associations of her name with that of the co-respondent. Being immensely rich in her own right, she can well afford to forego any alimony from the prince while in losing the title of princess of Monaco and of duchess of Mazarin, she has a right to resume her former style as widowed duchess of Richelieu, which is assuredly a more illustrious name than that of either Mazarin or Monaco Nor has she borne any children to the prince of Monaco since her marriage to him, so that she need not be influenced by considerations of that character.

LEGEND OF ARCTIC NIGHTS.

How the Greenlanders Account for Their Long Season of Darkness.

A member of one of the former Peary expeditions to Greenland tells of a curious tradition of the Eskimos to account for the long arctic night and its intense cold, says the Chicago Chronicle.

"There was a time," they say, "long generations ago, when the sun never set on the regions of the north and when the strands along the sea were forever hidden with mantles of living green.

"Hence it was that peace and plenty fell to the lot of this people and sorrow was unknown among them. But one day a strange thing came to pass. As the people were resting and feasting among the trees, as was their custom throughout their wakeful hours, a beautiful canoe, as white as ivory, was seen drifting silently toward the shore from the direction of the castle where dwelt the spirit of the winds.

"Now, when the ivory white canoe had floated quite up to the shore, a great awe fell upon the people, for there, fast asleep among the folds of an ermine robe, lay a beautiful maiden, whose skin was as fair as the snow flower and whose hair was like a mantle of sunshine. But when the chief had borne the maiden to the shore and questioned her whence she came he was troubled in his heart, for she had answered him:

"'I am Delfa, the daughter of the spirit of the winds, and I have drifted here from yonder snow-white castle in the north. But I will return there no more. Henceforth my home shall be with you and your people.'

"And immediately the spirit of the winds arose in the north and in a terrible voice commanded that his daughter be restored to him immediately. But when the people of the tribe sought out their chief and counseled him to give the princess into her father's hands the youth stood mute before them. Then, in obedience to a gesture, they entered his ruined house, and there on a couch lay the beautiful princess, with her white hands—whiter than the snow flowers—folded silently over her breast.

"When the spirit of the winds looked forth and beheld the princess cold in death on the desolate strand his anger was yet more terrible against the kneeling multitude and he commanded darkness to come down upon them. And the ice and the cold and the darkness continued for the space of many days before the offended spirit would relent and suffer the sunshine to return for a brief season."

GOLD HOARDED BY MISERS.

Through Them Millions in Yellow Coin Disappear Annually from Circulation.

The world is full of millions and millions of long-lost sovereigns. A competent authority has just completed some investigations which, he declares, show that in three years the Bank of England has lost trace of no fewer than 20,000,000 golden coins of the realm. This wholesale disappearance of the elusive sovereign has been going on for years. A river of gold has flowed unceasingly from Threadneedle street to all parts of the world, but it has come back only a tiny yellow streamlet. What has become of the surplus in its wanderings? "Misers" is the unpoetical explanation for a greater part of this disappearance. There still exist in this and other countries people who are unbusinesslike enough to hoard up gold and keep it lying idle by them for the sole pleasure of knowing it is there and occasionally counting it, says the London Mail.

The people of India appear to be particularly addicted to a habit that is more reminiscent of medieval times than of an age when money is generally saved so that more can be made with it. In the regency of Bombay it is estimated that 12,000,000 golden sovereigns are hoarded. If that is the record of Bombay alone what is the full tale for the whole country? China, too, absorbs a vast amount of gold that never sees the light again. As a matter of fact, while the whole world is searching for and trying to acquire gold, a goodly part of it appears to be engaged in the less thrilling pastime of hiding it away.

Great Britain is not guiltless of this commercial sin. Dotted all over the kingdom are graveyards of gold which if discovered and opened might restore to circulation a vast amount of wealth at present absolutely useless. At a spot about two miles from Herefordshire Beacon a treasure chest is recorded in the local history as having been buried by a great family once resident in the district. But the money cannot be found. There is a similar record in connection with Hulme castle, formerly a branch of the Prestwich family. Somewhere near Stokesey castle, Shropshire, there is believed to be hidden a great oaken chest filled with gold coins, but up to the present all efforts to find it have ended in failure.

Ancient Relics in Algeria.

In some grottoes in Algeria French explorers have recently discovered stone implements mingled with the remains of extinct animals belonging to quaternary times. Further explorations indicate that during the age when the grottoes were inhabited the coast of Algeria had a configuration different from that of today. Among the animals associated with the ancient and human inhabitants of Algeria were the rhinoceros, the hippopotamus and various species of ruminants.—N. Y. Times.

For Young People

THE FIVE PAIRS OF TWINS.

Polly, Polly, Polly, tell the five pairs of twins
(The tiny scraps of small ones,
The slim and toppling tall ones,
The cunningly devised ones,
The four just middling-sized ones)
We're going to have a candy-pull—to-night the fun begins—
So Polly, Polly, Polly, tell the five pairs of twins.

Polly, Polly, Polly, tell the five pairs of twins
They may make some candy dollies,
Like the china one of Mollie's,
And some yellow candy kittens,
And a pair of candy mittens,
And a lot of tiny candy toads with walnut meat for skins,
And a pile of candy fishes with the sweetest set of fins.

But Polly, Polly, Polly, if the five pairs of twins,
Go to swimming in molasses,
Or to smearing grandma's glasses,
Or to setting fire to paper,
Or—well, any kind of caper,
They'll all be tied together till they're sorry for their sins,
So Polly, Polly, Polly, warn the five pairs of twins.

And Polly, Polly, Polly, when the five pairs of twins
And the children of our neighbors
Have finished all their labors,
While without the sleet is pelting,
And within the candy's melting,
You must scrub those sticky infants till they're neat as jeweled pins,
Did you know your thumbs and fingers were the five pairs of twins?

ON CATARACT'S BRINK.

Unique Way in Which a Canadian Lumberman Was Saved from Almost Certain Death.

The horrible experiences of one who has been swept away by some merciless current and finds himself at last at the brink of a cataract, may possibly be imagined; but there are few who survive to relate to us the particulars of such an ordeal. Yet there is one instance where a man was saved at the very edge of the falls.

There are few more imposing bits of scenery in Canada than where the Ottawa river pours thundering and foaming over the Chandiere falls. When the water in the river is low, as it is in the autumn, there is a fall of about 40 feet, but when the river is swollen by melting snows in the spring the apparent depth of the fall is lessened. At any time the rush and swirl of the great river over this ledge of rock is a sight worth seeing.

In some places the water pours over in a dense and irresistible volume, while at other points a shallow stream will spray itself over a higher table of rock.

On the upper Ottawa are floated booms of logs which feed the large lumber industries of that region. Handling these wet logs is a treacherous business, and it is easy to lose one's foothold and fall into the swift stream. Accidents of this kind occur frequently. The only case that did not have a fatal termination is the one referred to here.

The man was busy forking these logs with those sharp prongs used to swing them about and draw them in, when he missed his footing and fell into the river. Though a strong swimmer, he could not withstand the current, and he was swept out into the stream and on toward the falls. Nearing the falls he found himself still conscious, and it happened that he was being floated over one of those tables of rock where the water was so shallow that he felt himself touch. He struggled to regain his feet and was successful in so doing, so that he found himself standing in, perhaps, a foot of rushing water, at the brink of the cataract, a great torrent surging by him on every hand.

But it seemd hopeless. He saw no way of getting to shore, and no one from the shore could get to him. Many people on the banks of the river were watching him and trying to study out some plan to save him. Finally a large derrick was brought to bear, such as is used in building operations. A great arm with ropes was swung out over the torrent, and when the man had fastened himself securely with the ropes, he was raised up high and swung in, just as a large stone would be raised in constructing a building.—Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

Why, Indeed?

"Say, Borroughs, how about that 'fiver' you've owed me for the last two years?"

"Oh, come, old man, why can't you let bygones be bygones."—Philadelphia Press.

THE KING OF DOGS.

Nero, a Vermont Mastiff, Is Considered the Largest Canine Now Living in the World.

In the town of Rutland, Vt., lives Nero, a huge German and English mastiff, who enjoys the distinction of being probably the largest dog in the world.

Nero is owned by Judge Wayne Bailey, of Rutland, who is very fond of his pet. From tip to tip Nero measures seven feet four inches, and he tips the scales at 285 pounds.

He stands nearly three feet in height, and he measures round his girth 52 inches. The circumference of his brass collar is 32 inches, and his foreleg measures 16½ inches.

Nero is very fond of the fair sex, and is a special favorite with ladies and children.

But when a strange man approaches his kennel, in Judge Bailey's back yard, let him beware, for Nero is not partial to strangers. One day a peddler visited the judge's house, and when Mrs. Bailey refused to buy of his wares, he threw himself in a fit of rage upon the floor. Mrs. Bailey called Nero, and with a bound the mastiff came to her rescue. The peddler went away in a hurry.

Nero's daily rations consist of a big pan of corncake and milk. This is his only meal, and, strange to say, for so large a dog he has a light appetite.

Judge Bailey has been offered large sums for Nero, but has never shown any desire to part with him.

In Rutland Nero is a prime favorite with all who know him.—Youth's Companion.

FIGHT TO THE DEATH.

South African Baboon Attacks a Man and Is Vanquished Only After a Fierce Battle.

Face to face on the mountain side a man and an ape battled to the death.

It was in South Africa, in that part of Cape Colony inhabited chiefly by Boers. And the man that battled with the ape was of that race which defied the power of Britain.

His name is Van Niekerk. The encounter took place on his own farm.

The ape was of the baboon variety. It was almost as large as the farmer and possessed the strength of four men.

There had been good success and the dogs were keyed up by victory when an unusually large male baboon was espied clambering down a precipice. When he reached the bottom the pack assailed him with great fury, and the men by common consent rested on their rifles to watch the combat.

It was a fine spectacle. The baboon seemed to enjoy himself. But what was play to him was death to the dogs. They began to retire from the arena one by one, whimpering and licking their wounds. Some had their bones laid bare. One or two were disemboweled.

A huge boarhound which had no rival on the veldt in the chase of big game had his throat ripped open and ran to crouch at his master's feet with eyes glazing and blood spurting from his jugular vein.

The situation was becoming serious, for among the remaining dogs were some valuable animals and the baboon was gradually retreating toward safety.

Fearing to fire lest he should injure the dogs, Van Niekerk plunged into the melee, armed only with a knife.

As the farmer rushed forward the ape swung with his right. No cat ever dealt a swifter blow, and yet the wary farmer managed to throw up his shoulder to meet it.

He was knocked down like a ninepin, but if it had not been for his quick defense he would have received the blow on the point of the jaw and that would have been the end of him.

As it was he scrambled to his feet before the baboon had time to leap upon him, and when the brute cast its hairy arms about him he delivered an upward lunge in the Mexican fashion and plunged his knife to the hilt in the big monkey's body.—N. Y. World.

INCYCLEDOM.

MOTOR TRICYCLING.

Amateur Authorities Predict That It Will Be the Coming Sport in the United States.

With the passing of the bicycle there comes in its place another form of outdoor sport which gives promise of becoming just as popular as wheeling. Although comparatively new, the motor tricycle has already gained a foothold in this country and before another year the choo-choo of the three-wheeler will become as familiar as the singing of the wind through the spokes of the old ordinary some ten or 12 years ago.

Automobiles were the opening wedge and following close on their rear wheels comes the three-wheeled machine that comes as close to cycling as anything could well be. In France and England the new vehicles are now a common sight. The French in particular are just as enthusiastic as they ever were over the bicycle, and that is saying a good deal. They ramp and tear across country on the tricycles at a pace that vies with the speed of the express trains, while on the race tracks the motor events are just as popular as the bicycle races.

Over in England good old "has-beens" are having a good lease on life and the racegoing public is treated to the sight of their old cycling champions once more straining every nerve to cross the tape first. In this country the eastern cities were the first ones invaded. Boston can be safely said to be the real center of the new sport and in the Hub the motorists are increasing in numbers.

One thing that motoring does, says the Chicago Record, is to give the champions of the American path something to do. Having seen their best days as speed merchants, they eagerly seize this chance to again get into the game. Eddie Bald, for years the American champion, has turned to the three-wheeler, and in and about Boston town the dashing Eddie and his motor tricycle are familiar sights. Down near Boston quiet Willie Windle, as fleet as any champion America ever had, and as true a sportsman as ever straddled a bicycle saddle, finds plenty of sport on a three-wheeler. After Zimmerman trimmed up Windle so neatly in the early '90s, Willie dropped out of sight and mind, but now the chances are that if motor tricycle racing becomes as popular here as it is in the old country the Milbury lad will be one of the first in the new game.

George A. Banker, of Pittsburgh, twice the world's champion, has just returned from France, and announces that he has discarded the bicycle for the three-wheeler.

WILLIAM W. WINDLE.
(Ex-Cycling Champion, Now an Enthusiastic Motorist.)

It was not until the last week or so that the first motor tricycle appeared in Chicago. It is a clumsy-looking vehicle, but how it can go! The rider sits on it and does not have to pedal, only to get it started, while the poor sparrow cop is driven distracted in his efforts to hail the rider and tell him to look out for the special ordinance. James Levy, for years one of the scratch men in the big road races, is the possessor of Chicago's first three-wheeler. At every stopping place he is surrounded by a curious crowd, while every scorcher on the boulevards makes an effort to "hook on" as the clumsy-looking but speedy machine dashes past. Gasoline is the motive power.

BRAKES ON BICYCLES.

Those Applied to the Tire Are the Safest and Have Always Been the Most Popular.

Brakes may be applied to bicycles in five ways—to the tire, to the rim of the wheel, to the inside of a small rim attached to the hub, to the outside of the rim, and by compressing the hub endwise. Brakes applied to the rim of the wheel have been used to some extent in England, but have never been favored by American riders or manufacturers. While it is not certain that wood rims are not entirely sufficient to resist the wear of a brake, the unsightly mark on the rim, the risk to the brake from accidental distortion of the wheel, and the spokes from accidental displacement of the brake, are among the reasons which have prevented the American wheelmen from looking upon the rim brake with much favor. On the whole, it appears that the brake may be most safely applied to the tire. Only one objection is urged against this method. Some persons say: "It wears the tire out." When such a person is cross-examined, it is generally found that what he meant to say was: "I should think it would wear the tire out." As a matter of fact, the wear on the tire is so very slight as to be unworthy of consideration. Curious as it may seem to the uninitiated, nevertheless the fact is that the steel spoon wears faster than the tire.—Golden Days.

FINE BICYCLE RIDER.

Young Englishwoman Who Holds the Undisputed Record for the Standing Balance.

Miss Day, who is an Englishwoman well known in bicycle circles, is said to be one of the best amateur trick riders. She is said to hold the record for the standing balance, having maintained her seat for two hours, balancing the wheel without moving. Another of her feats is that of riding one wheel and leading two others, which she picks up from the floor while on the move and entirely without the use of the handlebars.

This clever rider commences by mounting in the usual way, and by riding to the spot where a bicycle has been already placed upon the ground. This she reaches on her left side when the left pedal is descending. She takes advantage of this favorable moment to stoop and catch hold of the bicycle by the left handle; quickly swinging it up, she then transfers her grasp to the middle of the handlebar. A revolution of the pedals brings her within reach of the second machine lying to the right. Coming to a halt, she balances herself on the led bicycle, the tires of both front wheels touching, repeating the above operation with the right foot, and raising the second machine in a similar manner. The resumption of pedaling is a very difficult matter, partly on account of the cranks being in an unfavorable position for that operation, and also because the front wheel has a tendency to swing around and collide with one of the other of its neighbors—a tendency which, if not smartly checked, would cause a bad fall, as the rider has no means of saving herself. When the difficulties of the forward movement have been overcome, great care must still be exercised to avoid entanglement of pedals with steps, spokes or each other, and interlacement of handlebars. The rider keeps slightly in advance of her charges and executes circles very prettily, although the skill required to determine the exact relative positions when each machine must describe a different length of curve is of a very high order of merit.—Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

AVOIDED STARVATION.

How Jack Prince, Old-Time Bicycle Champion, Raised the Wind Down in Texas.

It is not often that a man has to do it, but he can run a race meet under necessity in the way named by Jack Prince, whose experiences cause many a smile. At San Antonio, Prince ran a race meet with but one other rider beside himself, and with no officials or ticket sellers or anything else but himself and one carpenter. It was a motor tandem race against 20 horses. In the first place, the street car company provided the lumber and the track was put up in the base ball park at San Antonio. One carpenter was employed and Prince and Oscar Julius put down the track with his aid. The track was all right, and Prince secured 20 horses with riders to go against the motor for $50. The track cost $75, and the advertising about $25. The horses, with their riders, and the motor on a wagon paraded the streets. The band—six pieces—played for 50 cents each and tickets of admission. Prince sold the tickets, and Julius took them at the gate. When all the people had reached the grounds Prince donned his racing clothes and got up to steer the motor. Then the race was started. "Those horses," said Prince, "just ran away every time, and I yelled at the fellow to let them loose every lap. Most of them went right to the fence and tried to kick it down. The horses made about seven miles and we made 15. The horses spent the rest of their time kicking at that fence. When the race was over I got off the motor and announced the race, telling them that it was won by Jack Prince, the old-time champion of America on the high wheel, and Oscar Julius, the champion of Sweden. Then we counted up the receipts. We had taken in $350 and had about $150 to pay out. That was not a bad thing at all, and it helped us that time for sure. It only goes to show that a man hasn't got to starve to death in this land of the free."

Youngest Bicycle Expert.

Little Katie Perry Cleveland is the youngest bicycle rider in America. The little girl is the daughter of P. W. Cleveland, of Latonia, Ky., and is only two years old. Mounted upon her tiny wheel she resembles a fairy. She rides a 12-inch wheel, and the wheel and rider combined only weigh 25 pounds. Her father has issued several challenges to parties claiming to have the youngest bicycle rider in America, but none of his challenges have ever yet been accepted. The little girl has a brother five years old, who also rides a wheel almost as small as his sister's. When the two little ones appear on their wheels together they attract great attention.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 21, 1901.

President McKinley has resumed his regular duties, but his physician has warned him not to work too hard for awhile. As a precationary measure, all his social engagements for a week or two ahead have been canceled. He shows no bad effects of his wrestle with the grip.

Secretary Root is now having a turn with the grip, but his assistants in the War Department are working over time, so as to rush the enlistments under the Army Reorganization bill, which is now in conference, but is expected to become a law during the present week. As there has never been any doubt that the bill would become a law, all the arrangements have been made in advance as far as possible.

The action of the Republican Senatorial caucus in deciding not to take up the Nicaragua Canal bill until the British government had signified its intentions concerning the amended Hay-Poncefote treaty, is regarded as a delicate hint to the British government that the Senate would like to know as soon as possible what it intends doing with the treaty. The House, after passing the Postal Codification bill, will at once take up the Naval Appropriation bill, which is expected to be promptly passed, as there are no features of the bill calculated to call for an extended debate.

Senator Hanna, who has a very creditable war record, although he never mentions it in talking and has not included it in his biography in the Congressional Directory, has been persuaded by Gen. Rassieur, commander in chief of the G. A. R., who has been in Washington lending his aid to that Pension Committee of the organization, to promise that he would become a member of the G. A. R.

Secretary Hitchcock is a strong advocate of Congressional legislation for the irrigation of the arid lands of the West. In a letter to the House Committee on Public Lands the Secretary urges the policy of public irrigation, taking the ground that a vast acreage, capable of supporting a population of fifty million people, should not be allowed to remain a desert. In support of his argument he cited the case of Egypt, which has in recent years been practically redeemed from a condition of bankruptcy by a general system of irrigation.

A single Republican Senator voted against the Army Reorganization bill—Wellington, and he is not considered a Republican by his colleagues—while four Democrats—Lindsay, McLaurin, Morgan and Sullivan—voted for it.

Senator Perkins seldom loses an opportunity to back up his arguments with a story. Here is one he told to show why he opposed attempting to prohibit the shipping of intoxicants to the Philippines: "When Alaska was a prohibition territory everybody was engaged in smuggling. On every ship that went up to Alaska the firemen, engineers, waiters and sailors tried in every way to smuggle liquor. I was the representative of a ship that went up there and was wrecked. She sank. We rescued the vessel and among the goods saved were thirty barrels that formerly contained sugar. In twelve of the barrels there were five gallon kegs of whiskey that had been hidden in the sugar. The sugar had melted but the whiskey was still there."

The Army Reorganization bill authorizes the President to enlist not exceeding twelve thousand natives of the Philippines for service in those islands, and army officers think there will be no trouble in getting as many recruits among the natives as it may be deemed advisable to enlist. The number is not likely to reach half of those authorized, for awhile at least.

Senator Proctor, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, says the Oleomargarine bill will be reported to the Senate this week, and that he will insist upon getting a vote upon it, if it be possible to do so, before the end of the session.

Senator Aldrich, chairman of the Finance Committee, disposed of all the idle talk about the Revenue Reduction bill being hung up in that committee when he said that the bill would positively be reported to the Senate in a few days, probably this week.

Senator McMillan, who has been classed by some newspapers as an opponent of the Ship Subsidy bill, which is again the unfinished business of the Senate, thus defines his attitude toward the measure: "I have been for the bill from the beginning and, in connection with several Senators, urged certain amendments solely for the purpose of perfecting the measure in such details as seem necessary, and which will undoubtedly improve the prospects of the bill. I will give the measure my earnest support, and have little doubt that every Republican Senator will do the same." The amendments referred to by Mr. McMillan have been agreed to and the bill is to be considered whenever appropriation bills are not before the Senate until disposed of. There is little, if any, doubt of the passage of the bill.

The equestrian statue of Gen. John A. Logan, made by Franklin Simmons, the famous American sculptor, has arrived in Washington and workmen are engaged in placing it on the handsome pedestal in Iowa Circle. President McKinley has promised Mrs. Logan that he will preside at the unveiling exercises and deliver a short address. The unveiling will not take place until the weather is suitable for an out door meeting.

CONDEMN EXTRA SESSION.

Scheme to Form Maryland Into "Gorman Satrapy."

Reform League to Express Disapproval This Afternoon—Messrs. Bonaparte and Cull Emphatic.

From Friday's Baltimore News.

The growlings of the people on the subject of an extra session of the Legislature is just beginning to be heard. This afternoon the executive committee of the Reform League will meet, and it is entirely safe and proper to prophesy that their condemnation of the plan will be emphatic enough to leave no doubt as to their position in the matter.

The board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce, at its meeting yesterday afternoon, was the first business organization to condemn the plan. They did not go into details about the matter, but their resolution was very much to the point. This will be an offset to the letters which Governor Smith says he has urging him to call an extra session. Politicians on both sides, however, know that public opinion will not have a great deal to do with deciding whether or not an extra session shall be called. The main question with which Governor Smith has to do at present is whether the session will accomplish the purpose for which the session is called, namely, to perpetuate the Democratic party.

Governor Smith had not visited his local office at 1 o'clock this afternoon, and the impression prevailed there that he had gone to Annapolis. Treasurer Vandiver was also said to be out of town. A number of callers discussed the proposed extra session in a desultory way, and agreed that, from a Democratic standpoint, it was a necessity.

A large number of well-known men have been disposed to treat the probabilities of an extra session lightly until the last few days. They have hardly believed it possible that such a matter was in serious contemplation, but now they seem to have thoroughly waked up to what seems to be an official notification that the extra session is to be summoned.

Mr. Charles J. Bonaparte, in an interview published below, pronounces the attempt "to bring back the days of 1875 and 1885, when they could cheat just as much as was needful to keep themselves in office, so that they might continue to steal from the State Treasury and sell legislation to the highest bidder."

Mr. Roger W. Cull wants to know if the State of Maryland is to be formed into a Gorman satrapy again, and says that any man may recognize under the thin disguise adopted "the hateful determinatian to undo the good work of a quarter of a century."

Mr. Bonaparte: "I have already expressed my views on this question, but it is of so much importance and, I fear, so imperfectly understood by people not specially interested in politics that I think every good citizen should do what he can to let in the light of day on the shameless and dangerous conspiracy. There is not the slightest legitimate reason for a special session; no one wants it except Democratic professional politicians and they want it only to tinker with the election laws. Any other reason they may allege is only an impudent subterfuge. Of course, subsidized newspapers, or papers in quest of a subsidy, may try to misrepresent and mislead public opinion, but every public man in the State knows perfectly well that the people are opposed to this project now and would be much more opposed to it were it better understood. Indeed, it is because its authors know that the people are against them, because they know that they will be beaten next November and would be beaten now on a fair vote; it is just because of this that they are trying to rob a part of the people of their votes, trying to bring back the days of 1875 and 1885, when they could cheat just as much as was needful to keep themselves in office, so that they might continue to steal from the State Treasury and sell legislation to the highest bidder.

"As for the suggested change in the ballot laws, by which illiterate voters would be obliged to vote like blind men, but not allowed the help blind men receive, it would be as plainly a violation of the Constitution as if the names of the candidates were required to be printed in Hebrew. Every Delegate and every Senator who voted for such a law, and the Governor, if he signed it, would be foresworn, and I cannot believe that the strongest partisan on the bench of Maryland would be willing to sustain its validity. A newspaper of this city has recently pointed out in its news columns that a similar law exists in Massachusetts, but has, very characteristically, suppressed all mention of the fact that in that State every voter is required by the constitution to read and write. Whether a similar provision in our Constitution would be wise or just is a question I need not discuss, but without it any such legislation as is proposed is worse than unconstitutional—it is a revolutionary usurpation."

Mr. Roger W. Cull said:

"The announcement, for such they should be taken to be, by Governor Smith and Ex-Governor Brown that an extra session of the Legislature will be held mean simply that the old and discarded leaders of the Democratic party have adopted the desperate policy of 1895, as then stated by Ex-Senator Gorman—that being in possession they intended to remain in possession. There is, it is true, a difference in the means to be employed to accomplish this end. Then it was disfranchisement by the roughs; now it is disfranchisement by law. Then disfranchisement was frankly brutal; now it is disguised under the form of an appeal to race antipathies and even to the thought, for an educational qualification is the form it takes. But under this disguise any man may read the hateful determination to undo the work of a half century, reaching its fruition in the election law of 1896, which made our election day as quiet as a Sabbath, converted the rough into a decent citizen, made every vote tell and the independent citizen master of the political situation in Maryland.

"To undo this great work, to make the independent citizen once more a negligible quantity, to make possible again and to perpetrate as far as may be the deplorable political condition antedating 1895, is the intention of the advocates of the extra session. Every good citizen, every body of citizens, every business interest, should speak out now emphatically against the nefarious scheme. Let the Republican party in Maryland once cease to be a formidable opposition, as it will be for years under the law, whatever its form, which is proposed, and this State will become another Pennsylvania, yielding for years to come its legitimate fruits of mis-government, scandals and Quays. We have had Gorman, and we know what he means, as the Pennsylvanians have had and have again Quay, and we know what he means. Is Maryland to become a Gorman satrapy as Pennsylvania is a Quay satrapy for the want of an independent, incorruptible and controlling opposition? I trust not. I cannot believe that we are to be subjected to such humiliation.

"This is not the time to speak of the constitutional and legal side of the considerations involved in the proposed disfranchisement of the negro, or of the action of Congress if the legislation is passed; these considerations are grave and difficult, but will be met when they arise. It is sufficient now to appeal to the conscience of the people to reject any encroachment upon their political rights and powers contemplated by the unworthy and desperate policy of the leaders of the Democratic party."

Mr. S. S. Field said: "The Constitution provides that the Governor may convene the Legislature on extraordinary occasions.

"As it looks like the Democratic party is to be handicapped in the campaign this fall by the same issue upon which it was defeated in 1895 and 1897, I suppose an extraordinary occasion exists to try to get rid of some Republican votes; and as the Presidential election is over and the negroes are not needed now to cooperate with sound-money Democrats in voting for honest dollars, some voting two honest dollars and some for the privilege of manufacturing thousands of rags, I suppose the negro vote ought to be got rid of.

"I think the pure Australian ballot would be an improvement, for a voter ought to know at least the names of the men he is voting for; but far more crying needs are laws to insure fair primaries, where the people, and not a few bosses, may choose their candidates, and to prevent bribery at elections. The extent to which votes are bought is a disgrace to our State which honest men of both parties ought to unite to wipe out. If an extra session will give us these measures of relief, by all means let us have it."

May be Convened in March.

It was reported in Democratic circles that the Legislature will be convened in special session the first Wednesday in March. Governor Smith reiterated his former statement that he has not decided what he will do.

Wellington's Senatorial Toga in Demand by Republicans of Maryland.

Since the Republicans of Maryland have a chance of carrying the next legislative election a number of aspirants for the United States Senate have sprung into existence, all of whom are anxious for the toga now worn by Senator Wellington. Among them are:

Representative Sidney E. Mudd, of Southern Maryland.

Representative George A. Pearre, of Cumberland.

Ex-Postmaster General James A. Gary, of Baltimore City.

This was an entire loss and it was with great difficulty that the house was saved.

A DISASTROUS FIRE.

Mr. Nimrod Glotfelty's Barn With Its Contents, Including Cattle and Horses, Burned Friday Night.

A telephone message to THE REPUBLICAN Saturday morning from the home of Mr. Nimrod Glotfelty, residing on the Grantsville road east of McHenry, conveyed the information that the night previous fire had destroyed his large barn, with its contents, consisting of eight head of horses, thirty-six head of fat cattle, 80 tons of hay, 200 bushels of wheat, 400 bushels of oats and about 50 bushels of buckwheat, besides farming implements, spring wagons, road wagons, harness, etc., entailing a loss of over $7,000, upon which an insurance policy in the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company for $2,200 was in effect.

How the fire originated is unknown, Mr. Glotfelty saying that no member of his household had been to the barn after nightfall and in consequence no light had been carried into it. The fire was discovered at one o'clock Saturday morning when the building was falling in and after it was impossible to save anything from the flames. In a shed built under the foreshoot of the barn was quartered 33 head of cattle, which succeeded in breaking out after some of them had been burned to a more or less extent.

The barn was an immense structure, it being 70x115 feet, well planned and built and was situated a short distance from the farm house. While Mr. Glotfelty is in comfortable circumstrnces the loss falls heavy upon him.

News of the B. & O.

The new Atlantic type locomotives soon to be adopted by the Baltimore and Ohio are model pieces of railway equipment. They are of wide firebox style and will be operated by the use of bituminous coal. The grate in area is 42.5 square feet and the total heating surface 2,663 square feet of which 150 square feet is in the firebox. The tubes are 10 feet one inch long. The firebox length 102 inches. The cab is at the rear end and Vaulain system of compounding is used. The total weight of the engine in working order is 149,60 pounds, and the weight on drivers is 83,400 pounds.

These locomotives have four driving wheels and by reason of pony wheels back of the drivers to carry the big fire box they will excite attention by their unusual appearence.

Railroaders say these engines "run like a scared dog." They will haul the fast trains.

His Wife Saved Him.

My wife's good advice saved my life writes F. M. Ross, of Winfield, Tenn., for I had such a bad cough I could hardly breathe, I steadily grew worse under doctor's treatment, but my wife urged me to use Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, which completely cured me." Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, LaGrippe, Pneumonia, Asthma, Hay Fever and all maladies of Chest, Throat and Lungs are positively cured by this marvelous medicine. 50c and $1.00. Every bottle guaranteed. Proposed Constitutional Amendments.

Three amendments to the Constitution of Maryland will be submitted to the voters of the whole State for ratification at the general election November 5, 1901, as follows:

I. Dividing the city of Baltimore into four legislative districts of as nearly equal proportions as may be, and of contiguous territory, and giving the city one senator from each of the districts, making four instead of three senators, as heretofore.

II. Increasing the representation of the city of Baltimore in the House of Delegates from 18 to 24, by allowing to each of the four legislative districts so created representation equal to that enjoyed by the largest county, which is six delegates.

The county basis of apportionment is not changed, the effect of the two amendments being simply to provide for Baltimore city one additional legislative district, one more senator and six more delegates in the General Assembly of 1904.

III. Providing that State's attorneys of the counties shall perform such duties and receive such fees and commissions or salary, not exceeding $3,000, as may now or may hereafter be prescribed by law. Fixing the salary of the State's attorney for Baltimore city at $4,500 a year with power to appoint one deputy at $3,000 a year, and such other assistants at not exceeding $1,500 a year as the Supreme Bench of Baltimore city may approve; all of such salaries to be paid out of the fees of the State's attorney's office, as has heretofore been the practice.

Spell Out Your Words.

Our correspondents and others, says an exchange, who occasionally contribute to these columns are requested not to depend on making their ideas known by the use of abbreviations. We have all these to decipher if the goat dosen't get the entire manuscript. The editor dosen't understand abbreviations very well; the business manager is too busy to devote time to them, the foreman is dead, and to send your abbreviations to the devil would be an imposition on that sulpher-fumed functionary who has his fires to keep up.

Wear Bright Colors.

People often wonder why lumbermen wear bright-colored clothing. In the conduct of the business of this world very few things are done without good reasons. It is the object of the man whose life is spent in the woods to make himself as conspicuous as possible, so that he cannot be shot by accident by a sportsman or felled by a tree that a fellow workman is chopping down.

Gray, blue and brown, the common colors of workaday clothing, are too near the shades of earth and sky and the barks of trees and the fur of wild animals to be readily distinguished, so foresters and tree choppers wear the brightest colors, often in plaids of clear green, yellow, red and blue.

In early pioneer days the red flannel shirt was the universal badge of the rail-splitter, because that could be got. Now, however, there is a wide choice, and every lumber camp generally has a different outfit.

GIVING.

Old Hardenhart sat in his pillowed arm-chair;
A gleam from the grate gilt his scanty gray hair,
As he gazed at the flame, faint, flickering and low,
And he fancied his long, lonely life was just so,
A burnt-out fire
Soon to expire,
And wondered if he was as ready to go.

Then spake a small voice in his dark, troubled breast:
"You have still work to do ere you go to your rest.

"Though the light of your knowledge you freely have spent,
You too rarely the warmth of your bounty have lent;

"Yet all wealth—won with labor of muscle or brain—
Should descend on your fellows, like blessings of rain;
Use ennobles man's being—that of all life is true;
Know, that fagot has done its full duty; have you?"

Then the dreamer awoke, in the dark and the cold,
Half resolved to reverse selfish habits of old.

"What I gathered with toil cost me worry to keep,
And the hate of my fellows—who steal if I sleep.
Better give while I live," thus the poor rich man said,
"Else no one will be sorry when I am dead."

When Beggar Lady Won

A young Baltimorean and his wife celebrated the second anniversary of their marriage by coming over to Washington on Monday morning last to see congress assemble, and they remained over a day for the purpose of having a look at the Benning racing. Despite Tuesday's vicious weather, they went out to the track. It was the first time the young man had "seen 'em run" since his marriage, although before that solemn event he had been an often-bitten victim of the "horse bug." Like all men who have sworn off on fooling with the thoroughbreds, however, he had kept a pretty fair "line" on the runners by assiduously reading the results from all of the tracks, so that when he went to the track on Tuesday he thought that he had a fair chance of breaking about even with the layers of odds. His wife had never seen a horse race in her life before, and when the horses clamped around through the mud in the first race she exhibited considerable excitement, despite the cheerless surroundings caused by the weather conditions. Her husband, however, didn't look particularly inspirited when the number of the winner was hung up. His face wore a sheepish grin, in fact.

"Why," said his wife, noticing his chagrined look, "didn't the horse that you bet on win?"

"No," he replied. 'He was beaten a head on the wire."

"Well, it looked to me as if they both passed by just at the same time," she said, with rather an aggrieved air. "I don't think it ought to make any difference if one of them is just a teeny little bit ahead of the other, do you?"

"Well," he explained, "there's got to be a winner, you know, unless the race's a dead heat, which this wasn't."

"I don't care one bit," she replied, "I think that horse that the old things in the judges' stand say came in second is just as good as the one they say came in first."

"They wouldn't admit that, though, if you were to tell them," said the husband. "Funny I couldn't pick the winner in a field of only four horses, isn't it? Well, I'll run down to the ring and see what the betting is on the next."

She looked as if she had something to say, and she said it before he got away.

"Jack," she said, in a wheedling tone, "let me bet a teeny weeny little bit, too, won't you? It makes it so much more exciting."

"Jack" looked at her with a grin.

"You bet, eh?" he said. "What d'ye suppose your mother 'ud say to me if she found out that I let you bet? And, say, isn't it enough to have one hoodoo loser in the family? Can't you have just as much fun 'rooting' for the one I bet on?"

"Oh, but it would be so much nicer if I could bet just a teenchy weenchy little bit on one of the pretty things that I picked out myself on the programme," she answered.

"Oh, that's all imagination, and you—"

"Please," she said, still more wheedlingly.

"Oh, well, then, beggar lady, go ahead," he said, stripping off a $5 note from his roll of bills, and then he rushed down the stairs to the betting ring.

Her eyes sparkled as she looked over the names of the horses for the second race on her programme.

"Beggar Lady!" she exclaimed, half aloud, as her eye caught the name of one of the horses to run. "Why, that's just what Jack just this minute called me! Beggar Lady!"

At that instant one of the grand stand messengers passed by, with his list of odds against the horses in his hand. She stopped him.

"Can Beggar Lady run real fast?" she asked him, demurely.

"I don't know, ma'am," answered the messenger, smiling. "The filly's never run before in a race. This is her first time out."

"Well, if she wins, how much do I get for this?" she said, showing him the five-dollar bill.

The messenger grinned and glanced at his list of prices.

"Beggar Lady's one o' the outsiders, ma'am," he said. "She opened at 40 to 1. I'll give you that. If she wins you get back $205."

The little woman paled a little.

"Goodness gracious—very well, then," handing him the five-dollar bill. "I will bet you on Beggar Lady, then."

The messenger dotted down the bet and the young woman's initials, immediately after which another grand-stand messenger rushed up to him and said something to him in a low tone. The messenger who had registered the betting transaction with the young woman approached her again.

"Well, you just were in time, ma'am," he said to her. "That Beggar Lady filly has been hammered—"

"Hammered!" exclaimed the young woman. "Why, the brutes! Is the poor thing—"

"Oh," hastily explained the messenger, "I mean that they've been knocking her price down in the ring, and now she's only five to one, so that it looks like she may be what's called a 'good thing.'"

"Well, I declare!" ejaculated the young woman, and just as the messenger went away her husband came up wearing an easy smile of confidence.

"There's only one in this," he said to his wife in a cock-sure tone, pointing to Zenaide's name on the programme, "and that's the favorite. Zenaide'll win romping all the way. I bet $20 on her—got $50 to $20 against her."

"Can Zenaide run so much faster than all the rest of the horses in the race, then?" she asked him, with big eyes.

"Sure," he replied. "It's a cinch. A lot of yaps down in the ring think they've got a good thing in this Beggar Lady, and they are more than eating it up. Played the filly down from 50 to 1 to five to one, and they're still hammering at it. I've seen too many of these good things go wrong in my day, though. No more good things for me. Friend of mine out in the paddock told me that Beggar Lady—she's never faced the starter before, by the way—stood a rattling show to land in the money, and advised me to string a few along on her, one, two, three, across the board—but not for me! Zenaide's the trick. By the way, what did you do with your money? Play any of 'em?"

"Yes, I bet," she replied. "I felt awfully wicked, but I bet, all the same."

"Which one?" he inquired.

"It'll be more fun telling you after the race is all over," she replied, slyly.

Then the horses paraded in front of the stand and went to the post. After a short delay away went the large field, the favorite, Zenadie, in front. It was a fair start for all except Beggar Lady, who was standing flat-footed when the flag dropped. A laugh went up in the stand.

"The 'good thing' can't find her feet," was the cry. "She's all but left."

Beggar Lady was last away, it was true, but she quickly shot after her field, and at the far turn, so great a flight of speed did she exhibit, she was right on even terms with the leaders, and still going like a seasoned campaigner. She led the field of 13 by a head in turning into the stretch.

"By jing!" muttered the young Baltimorean to his wife, "why didn't I have gumption enough to put a few dollars on that Beggar Lady? She's passed the whole bunch and she's just galloping in, that's all—just galloping!"

"Beggar Lady walks!" howled the crowd of long-shot players who had taken a bit of the good thing. "Beggar Lady swims in!"

The little lady from Baltimore turned her pale face away from the sight of the horses tearing down the stretch and sat down.

"And I had the tip strong!" growled her husband, as Beggar Lady flashed by the wire two lengths to the good. Then he noticed his wife's pale face. "What's the matter?" he asked her, anxiously. "Are you faint?"

"Well," she replied, "a little bit, but it'll pass. I suppose sudden great wealth always affects people this way."

He looked at her searchingly and amazedly.

"You don't mean to tell me that you put those five dollars on Beggar Lady?" he gasped.

"Well, what did you call me a 'beggar lady' for when you gave me the bill?" she asked him, regaining her color. "I've won $200 just because of your habit of calling names!"

"Oh, you can't beat 'em," the Baltimorean said to a friend that night.

ESTIMATING MINE VALUES.

Method of Ascertaining Worth of Deposits Employed by Experts.

With the news that John Hays Hammond's proposal to take charge of the Independence gold mine had been accepted by the London owners came the report that the mine had been "worked out." This statement had been made many times before, and much doubt existed in the minds of interested parties when Mr. Hammond's latest report was received, says the New York Tribune. This document showed that the property which for a long time yielded a 40 per cent. dividend on a large investment, was still rich in ore, and capable of producing large profits. Mr. Hammond said that the "ore in sight" warranted him in guaranteeing a dividend of ten per cent., or $488,000, and that would leave about $500,000 out of the year's deposits to be used toward the further development of the property and locating new ore beds.

The phrase "ore in sight" is one that is well understood by people who are interested in the mining business, but is misunderstood by the average layman. The ore is not "in sight" on the surface, but its existence is established by a series of operations which are in many instances exceedingly difficult, expensive and laborious.

Speaking on this subject, Dr. A. R. Ledoux said: "There is no way to determine the existence of gold ore, its quantity, quality, or anything about it unless one gets on three sides of the deposit, and even then there is an element of uncertainty about it. Ore in sight is what has been found after 'blocking' out a certain section of ground. The 'blocking' is accomplished in various ways in keeping with the nature of the ground. Thus, by sinking a shaft of 20 feet in width 100 feet into the earth and then running a level from this, say 200 feet, to another shaft the same depth and width as the first, and then taking samples of the ore or rock from all parts of this block one would have a good idea of the yielding qualities of that particular block. This block would be 400,000 cubic feet, or about 20,000 tons, and the assays from the four sides, the two shafts, the tunnel and the surface would be the 'gold in sight.' The center of the block, which cannot be reached until actual operations are begun, might yield much more than the assays indicated, and, on the other hand, it might be found worthless or barren rock. In cases where the block of 100x200x20 feet would be deemed insufficient for determining the value of the mine, another block of similar size may be laid out below or beyond the first, and by this series of blocking the value of the mine as a gold producer is estimated. It is a well-known fact that gold is often deposited in 'shoots' that run in oblique and tortuous directions from the surface, and one must be posted on the geology of the country to arrive at a correct estimate of the value of the land that has been blocked out. A shaft, for instance, may run for 100 feet through rich ore and another parallel shaft 200 feet away may not strike any ore until a depth of 100 feet or more has been reached. The next shaft 200 feet further away may have to be sunk still further before the valuable rock is reached, and this would indicate that the shoot runs diagonally from the surface. This is only one of the many phenomena in the matter of gold veins that present themselves to the miner, and no set rule can be followed in order to locate the valuable ore or to determine its extent. But the term gold in sight' or 'ore in sight' is usually applied to the block or to the series of blocks which have been examined and assayed on three sides."

WANTED TO FIGHT OLD NICK.

Pat Thought He Was in Fit Condition to Lick His Satanic Majesty.

Pat Brophy was one of the characters of the county some 35 years ago, says the Maysville Ledger. He belonged to a family of six stalwart brothers, immigrants from the Emeraid Isle, who seemed to have an inherent love of the "crathur."

On one occasion Pat had been to church, and hadn't forgotten to get his jug filled for the week.

Now, among other virtues claimed by the Brophys was one that they could whip anything between the river and the North Fork, and frequent brawls were the consequence.

On this particular occasion, Pat being alone, no fisticuffs had come off, and the blithe son of Erin had nearly reached his home, when he was seized with a desire for a wee drop.

The jug was in his sack across his saddle, and, in dismounting, everything went to the ground together.

The consternation depicted on Pat's countenance at the untoward state of affairs as the jug gave way was something to behold, but it was soon superseded by one of anger.

Pat couldn't do the subject justice, but according to a gentleman who happened to be near "unbeknownst," he issued a challenge to his Satanic majesty in these words:

"Domned if I don't dare, the devil to come up and fight one round wid me."

A FITTING REBUKE.

Administered by a Heroic Messenger Boy to a Cowardly and Stingy Man.

There was a trifling fire in a west side street the other day which caused a good deal of excitement and incidentally gave a fat man a lesson in courtesy. The fire started in the apartments where the man and his mother lived. The man started about the time the fire did and got down four flights of stairs to the street before his mother knew what was up. When she discovered the fire she promptly fainted, says the New York Mail and Express.

Meanwhile the fat man stood in the street yelling: "Save my mother! Save my mother!" A messenger boy who was passing stopped, saw the smoke, ran up the stairs, aroused the woman and brought her out in safety. The neighbors cheered and the fat man looked uncomfortable.

"Here, boy," he whispered. "Here's a quarter for you."

The boy's face expressed his disgust.

"Aw, save it," he said, "and buy yourself some nerve food."

The crowd laughed, the fat man blushed and the boy went whistling down the street. He didn't know that he had been a hero, and the fat man felt himself a coward.

MISS FRANCES M. ANDERSON, daughter of HON. JUDGE ANDERSON, of Virginia, is at present in Washington, D. C., as Corresponding Secretary of the Higher Educational League, of that city. Cured of la grippe by Peruna.

MISS FRANCES M. ANDERSON, Corresponding Secretary of the Higher Educational League, writes from the "Astoria," Washington, D. C., the following:

"About two months ago I was taken very ill with la grippe and was obliged to go to bed. I took three bottles of Peruna with very beneficial results, and was able to leave my bed in a week and regained my usual strength very soon.

"I have nothing but praise for Peruna and recommend it to those similarly afflicted whenever I can."—Frances M. Anderson.

La grippe is, strictly speaking, epidemic catarrh—that is to say, a variety of acute catarrh which is so contagious and runs a course more or less definite, the same as scarlet fever, whooping cough, etc.

During the acute stages of la grippe it is not a very fatal disease, but the condition in which it leaves the system has caused the death of a countless number.

Indeed nearly every person who has had la grippe within the last three years finds himself more or less deranged by the pernicious effects of this disease. The majority of those who have escaped death find life scarcely worth living.

If this vast multitude of people could only know with what certainty Peruna would relieve them of all the bad effects which la grippe has brought upon them, what an untold amount of suffering could be averted!

Thousands have already heard how quickly this remedy will cure in these cases and have been saved; but tens of thousands have not yet heard, and continue to suffer on, dropping into the grave one by one.

Peruna cures catarrh in all stages and varieties, whether acute or chronic, and is therefore the most effective remedy ever devised for removing all the derangements which follow la grippe.

Samuel M. York writes from Union Grove, Ala., the following letter:

Dear Sir:—"Last week I was taken with la grippe and catarrhal deafness. I wrote you for advice and followed your directions. After taking two bottles of Peruna I found myself well of la grippe, and my hearing was fully restored. My health is better than it has been in five years.

"My wife improved in health very much after taking Peruna."—Samuel M. York.

Miss Caroline J. Kahl, Otisco, Ind., writes as follows:

"Three years I had la grippe and pulmonary trouble. I was very sick. I had hemorrhages of the lungs nearly evrey day for a year, and three bottles of your Peruna cured me. The doctor said I had consumption. I am now in better health than I have been for many years.

"I highly recommend Peruna to all my neighbors and friends. Peruna is my favorite medicine. I shall always have Peruna in the house."—Miss Caroline J. Kahl.

If you do not derive prompt and satisfactory results from the use of Peruna, write at once to Dr. Hartman, giving a full statement of your case and he will be pleased to give you his valuable advice gratis.

GREEN TERROR OF FRANCE

Absinthe, the Drink That Is Enslaving the Nation and Ruining It Body and Soul.

When the French house of deputies passed a bill recently which forbids the manufacture or sale in France of absinthe and other alcoholic liquors which are pronounced "dangerous" by the Academy of Medicine, it recognized the terrible spread of the "green terror," which is said to be responsible for the great increase in insanity and other similar afflictions among the French people. Since 1894, as was pointed out in the chamber of deputies, the amount of absinthe consumed in France has doubled, it now reaching the amount of 10,000,000 litres, or nearly 10,060,000 quarts annually. This amounts to one quart of absinthe to each three inhabitants, including men, women and children. In Paris the reports of the ministry of finance show that there is an absinthe seller to every three buildings in the metropolis. Already the green terror has killed many of the brilliant men of the country. Guy de Maupassant, Alfred de Musset, Baudelaire, who translated Poe's works into French; Theodore Barriere, Andre Cill, the artist, and a host of other men of letters and of genius burned their brains away with the green flame and died miserable deaths. Even four years ago, before the habit had reached half its present strength, Henri Rochefort started a crusade against its use. In his appeal to the people he said: "Absinthe is the bane of the nation and is killing France."

THE ABSINTHE HOUR IN PARIS.

But absinthe is not the only drink of fashionable and cultivated Paris. It has come to be the national drink of all classes of the French people. Women drink it as well as men, and the children of absinthe drinkers are often deformed and partially paralyzed.

Absinthe is a liquor made by pounding the leaves and flowering tops of various varieties of wormwood which grow from two to four feet high in great profusion under cultivation, and various other aromatic plants and covering the mass with alcohol. After soaking for eight days the compound is distilled, yielding a green liquor, to which a certain percentage of anise seed oil is usually added. It was first made by a couple of old Swiss women, who found it a good remedy and preventive for fevers. It is said to be still possible to get the pure absinthe in the better class of French cafes, but in this country and in England, as in the greater number of French drinking places, the stuff served as absinthe is said to be adulterated with all sorts of vile drugs, including even vitriol, to give it an extra "bite." The best absinthe is still made in Switzerland, immense quantities of it being turned out at Neufchatel, from which canton more than 1,000,000 gallons is annually exported, a considerable portion eventually coming to the United States.

The effects of absinthe on people who drink it habitually are admitted by medical men to be worse than those which follow the use of brandy or other strong spirits. It soon becomes to its devotees the first necessity of life. To get it they will sacrifice anything. Taken by a novice and in small doses, it has for a time pleasant effects.

In Paris and in the south of France its devotees are almost numberless. A Frenchman who goes to his cafe for luncheon or dinner sits at a table in front, and, while his order is being prepared, sips his glass of absinthe as he looks over the papers. From five to seven o'clock in the evening is the recognized "absinthe hour." The absinthe is usually prepared by being poured into a glass with some sirup or lump sugar, into which water is allowed to fall drop by drop. The fashionable Frenchman is not likely to drink more than one glass before a meal, and that diluted, though French women are said to drink it pure, and in the poorer sections of the city it is drunk before, during and after meals. In the better cafes it is sold at ten cents a drink, and in the slums it may be had for a penny a glass. The allowance of an absinthe drinker must be regularly increased in order to produce the desired and accustomed effect, and so sooner or later the boulevard absinthe sippers are almost certain to become slaves of the liquor.

On men who are far gone with its poison the "green terror" sometimes has most remarkable effects. Baudelaire, for instance, the poet who translated Poe into French, wrote poems to "The Green Spirit" and addressed it as his mistress. He lived apparently for nothing else than to drink absinthe and once in a fit of crazy enthusiasm actually painted his hair a vivid green so that it might correspond with the color of the poison to which he was a devotee.

Tortoni's famous cafe was in the old days the resort of a coterie of writers and artists who came there before the dinner hour to drink their absinthe. For many years the green liquor was drawn from the same old barrel, which was periodically filled with absinthe brought from Neufchatel. Among the young men who were present every evening in the crowd was Theodore Barriere. He became a victim to the absinthe demon in its worst phases and his disordered brain was filled for months with the weirdest and most terrifying dreams and visions.

Alfred de Musset, the poet, became such a devotee to the green terror that he made no effort in his later years to stop its use. Regularly night after night he went to his cafe and sat there consuming glass after glass, until he was in such a condition that he was often picked up unconscious on the streets.

During the Paris exposition, just over, there was an example of the mad freaks of an absinthe fiend, which for a moment startled thousands of people. President Loubet was driven in his carriage to the exposition grounds, surrounded by cuirassiers, when a wild-eyed man broke from the crowd on the sidewalk, tore his way through the line of soldiers and threw himself at the door of the president's carriage. All who looked on thought him an anarchist and were certain that he was about to assassinate the president. Instead, however, of making any hostile demonstration he simply tossed an envelope into the carriage. It contained the photograph of his niece. He was Jaques Mara, a waiter, in one of the many phases of an absinthe drunkard.

It would be unpleasant reading to detail the manner in which most of the devotees of the green terror come to their death. One of the early effects of absinthe is to practically destroy the power of the digestive organs. A little later it paralyzes the nerves and upsets the mind. In the end it leaves nothing that can be said to resemble a man.—Chicago Tribune.

DRINK QUESTION IN INDIA.

Becoming a Serious One According to Sundar Singh Bhatia, of That Country.

At the world's temperance congress a paper on the above topic was read by Sundar Singh Bhatia, chairman of the Zafarwal Temperance society. "The consumption of drink in India," says the author, "is fearfully on the increase among all classes, and signs of general deterioration are becoming apparent every day."

He then takes a brief survey of the teaching of the various religions of that land, from which we cull the following:

The intoxicants are prohibited by the Koran, and are therein described as "sins" and "acts of the devil."

A few words now as to custom and tradition, which so long enforced the above precepts. Tradition has preserved a saying which shows the horror in which intoxicants used to be held. We are told: "The man who even touches by his feet the broken pieces of an earthern wine-can, throws seven of his paternal ancestors down the depths of hell."

To a Mohammedan—"Prohibited is the flesh of a goat which has partaken of grass grown where even a drop of liquor fell." His prayers would not be heard when drunk.

Prompt exclusion from caste used to be the penalty for drinking.

The teachings did not confine themselves to mere personal abstinence, but the liquor traffic also came in for its share of evil repute and odium. The Kalals, or the publican class, came to be regarded as a low and disreputable class in the community, with whom eating and mixing were absolutely interdicted.

It now remains only to add a few words as to the duty of religion. We must all appeal to the Almighty to open the eyes of our brethren who are falling from their former position, and especially the class which acted as the counsellor, guide and friend of the people in this land.

But the people of England must also share the blame. As Dean Farrar said: "The bottle has everywhere accompanied the Bible," and has in India, at any rate, made this curse of mankind a popular and respectable companion, that which the Indian civilization thought to be low and disreputable. We acknowledge that they are doing us good now and are grateful, but I appeal with confidence to the representatives of the cause in this congress assembled, to help us in stemming the tide ere it is too late. Will they not heed this appeal from a distant land, peopled with fellow-subjects of the same crown—the poorest in the whole civilized world, yet with the millstone of drink round their neck? Famine is attracting attention, pestilence is evoking sympathy, and I trust this prayer for help against the common foe will not go in vain.

Is Alcohol a Muscle Food?

Prof. Bunge, of Switzerland, cites Baer on Der Alkoholismus, Berlin, 1878 (page 103): "Better than through all the laboratory experiments and deductions is the demonstration of the complete uselessness, indeed harmfulness, of even the most moderate doses of alcohol, which demonstration has been made through the thousandfold experiments by the commissariat of the army and which have already established conclusively that soldiers in times of peace and in times of war, in all climates, in heat, cold and rain, endure best of all the fatiguing exertions of the most exhausting marches and maneuvers when they are deprived absolutely of all alcoholic drinks."—Union Signal.

WIDOW OF FREMONT.

Still Retains a Lively Interest in the Active World.

Lives Happily in a Dainty Cottage in Los Angeles—Memories of the Days When She Was a Social Leader.

One of the points of interest in Los Angeles, southern California, is the Fremont cottage, given by the women of California to Mrs. Jessie Benton Fremont, widow of Gen. John C. Fremont, known as the Pathfinder because of the important part he took in the acquisition and development of California.

The cottage is surrounded by beautiful grounds, and the interior is charming with fine old furniture, souvenirs of foreign travel and relics belonging to Gen. Fremont. Mrs. Fremont's life has been exceptionally full of incident, much of it being of historical interest, as she is over 70, and has been until late years associated with the best political and social circles of Washington and Europe, her father having been United States senator for 30 years.

As Miss Benton her first appearance into the really fashionable world occurred when, at 14, she was chosen one of the eight bridesmaids for the wedding of the elderly Russian ambassador, Count Bodisco. Count Bodisco's bride, a girl of 16, was, with Jessie Benton, being educated at the Georgetown seminary.

At this wedding Henry Clay gave the bride away, and the guests included President Martin Van Buren; the English minister, Henry Fox; James Buchanan, then senator; Chevalier de Martini, from The Hague; Farragut, then young, and a long list of cabinet officers, all the diplomatic corps and army and navy officers, with their wives and daughters. Among others of Mrs. Fremont's early memories are those of the grand balls and dinners given to the prince de Joinville, the son of the "King of the French," who visited Washington in 1841, when Tyler was president and Webster secretary of state; also, the functions given in honor of Lord and Lady Bulwer (the latter, it may be remembered, was niece of the duke of Wellington), who came over direct from England in a man-of-war with a whole legation, only dropping anchor in the Potomac. Attached to this legation was the young author of "Lucile," afterward known as viceroy of India.

While in Europe in 1852 and 1853 Mrs. Fremont's life was full of interest, from her first evening out in London at the town house of the duke of Northumberland, through a long list of brilliant functions. In Paris she witnessed the entrance of Louis Napoleon as emperor, for, although her parents had opposed her marriage to a "poor lieutenant," John C. Fremont early acquired distinction.

The culminating point in Fremont's life was his candidacy for the presidency in 1856. He was the first republican candidate for president, and Mrs. Fremont was a prominent factor in the campaign. When the war came and Fremont distinguished himself by freeing his slaves, Mrs. Fremont was in sympathy with his action; when he refused to serve under Pope she upheld him; when their life was beset with poverty and suffering she shared adversity with patience.

In her old age, says the New York Tribune, Mrs. Fremont still retains her interest in the active world, and the many persons of distinction who visit Los Angeles seldom fail to pay their respects to her.

The Bicycle Wheel in Astronomy.

At the Yale observatory an interesting use has been found for the bicycle wheel. By fitting such a wheel with a series of opaque screens placed at regular intervals and then rotating it with the aid of a small motor at the rate of from 30 to 50 turns in a minute in front of the cameras used to photograph meteors, Dr. Elkin has succeeded in measuring the velocity of the meteors' flight. The principle depends upon the intererruptions produced by the screen in the trails of light made upon the photographic plates by the flying meteors. The velocity of the wheel is known at every instant by means of a chronographic record, and the length of the interruptions indicates the speed of the meteors.—Youth's Companion.

CANAL IDEA IS AN OLD ONE.

Early Navigators Discussed Cutting Through the Isthmus of Panama.

The advantages of a canal or navigable channel through the isthmus of Panama is so obvious that it is not surprising to find the idea of such a waterway was seriously considered in the early days of Spanish conquest in the new world, says the Newcastle (England) Chronicle.

In the year 1527 the famous Cortes, being then in Mexico (or New Spain), sent three ships on a voyage to the Moluccas in charge of Alvaro De Saavedra. The expedition was an unfortunate one, as two of the ships were lost on the outward voyage, and Saavedra did not live to carry out his intention of returning by way of the city of Panama, on the Pacific side, and thence across the isthmus. His view was that at Panama he "might unlade the cloves and merchandise that he had, that so in cartes it might be carried across the planes fouer leagues, to the river Chagre, which they say is navigable, running out into the North sea not far from Nombre de Dios, where the ships ride which come out of Spaine."

In his "Discoveries of the World" published in 1555 and translated by Hakluyt and published in England in 1601, Antonio Galvano, governor of Ternate, in the Moluccas, says of Saavedra:

"If he had lived he meant to have opened the land of Castilia de Oro and New Spain from sea to sea, which might have been done in four places—namely, from the Gulfe of St. Michael to Uraba, which is 25 leagues, or from Panama to Nombre de Dios, being 17 leagues distant; or through Zaquator, a river of Nicaragua, which springeth out of a lake three or fouer leagues from the South sea, and falleth into the North sea; whereupon doe saile great barks and crayers. The other place is from Tecoantepec, the river of Vera Cruz in the Bay of Honduras, which also might be opened in a straight, which, if it were done, then they might saile from the Canaries into the Malucos under the zodiake in a temperate climate, in lesse time and with much lesse danger, than to saile through the Cape of Bona Speranza or by the Straight of Magellan, or by the northwest."

Tale with a Moral.

There was once a Woman who had Never Learned how to Swim, although she Went in Bathing every day in the Summer. She had a Friend who had Acquired this Art with Some Trouble, and was very Proud of her Proficiency in it.

"It is Absurd," said this Friend, "to Live near the Water and not Swim. It makes you very Attractive to Good Swimmers if you can Go Out with them, and they do Not Feel that you are a Drag on their Pleasures. What would you Do in Case you Fell off the Pier? Now, Watch me!"

With these words she Dived off into the Water and Swam about by Herself.

"It is a Good Thing to have a Woman Swim so Well," said one of the Men near by; "Now, if any of the Children fall into the Water, she can Rescue them."

Just then the Woman who Could Not help Herself uttered a Scream and Fell into the Sea. Instantly Five Men leaped in to Rescue Her, and Spent the Rest of the Day Resuscitating her and Inquiring How she Was, leaving the Swimmer to Dive by Herself.

A Child's Query.

The recent death of the third duke of Wellington called to mind memories of the first bearer of this historic title. A pretty story was told at the time of a little girl who witnessed the great duke's funeral from the windows of Lord Ashburton's house. The child watched the mournful procession pass by, and said nothing until the hero's horse appeared, its saddle empty and the duke's boots reversed in the stirrups. "Mother," queried the little one, "when we die will there be nothing left of us but our boots?"

"I am so Glad you are well, Dear Sister."

This picture tells its own story of sisterly affection. The older girl, just budding into womanhood, has suffered greatly with those irregularities and menstrual difficulties which sap the life of so many young women.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound can always be relied upon to restore health to women who thus suffer. It is a sovereign cure for the worst forms of female complaints,—that bearing-down feeling, weak back, falling and displacement of the womb, inflammation of the ovaries, and all troubles of the uterus or womb. It dissolves and expels tumors from the uterus in the early stage of development and checks any tendency to cancerous humors. It subdues excitability, nervous prostration, and tones up the entire female system.

Could anything prove more clearly the efficiency of Mrs. Pinkham's Medicine than the following strong statement of Grace Stansbury?

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I was a sufferer from female weakness for about a year and a half. I have tried doctors and patent medicines, but nothing helped me. I underwent the horrors of local treatment, but received no benefit. My ailment was pronounced ulceration of the womb. I suffered from intense pains in the womb and ovaries, and the backache was dreadful. I had leucorrhœa in its worst form. Finally, I grew so weak I had to keep my bed. The pains were so hard as to almost cause spasms. When I could endure the pains no longer, I was given morphine. My memory grew short and I gave up all hope of getting well. Thus I dragged along. To please my sister I wrote to Mrs. Pinkham for advice. Her answer came, but meantime I was taken worse and was under the doctor's care for a while.

"After reading Mrs. Pinkham's letter, I concluded to try her medicine. After taking two bottles I felt much better; but after using six bottles I was cured. All of my friends think my cure almost miraculous. I thank you very much for your timely advice and wish you prosperity in your noble work, for surely it is a blessing to broken-down women. I have full and complete faith in the Lydia E. Pinkham Vegetable Compound."—GRACE B. STANSBURY, Herington, Kansas.

To "Manacle and Muzzle Voters."

As the Maryland Democrats read the census returns the painful conclusion is borne in upon their minds that the most rapid rate of growth in population in their State is in sections whose instincts and traditions are Republican. In their dilemma, with Baltimore Republican whenever the currency issue is raised, with western Republican counties developing new industries daily and in close touch with progressive West Virginia, with eastern counties drifting away from them, the Maryland Democrats not knowing how to account for all these things in any other way consistent with their own claim of giving the best government, have hit upon the plan of challenging the accuracy of the census of 1900. Their leaders and newspapers are dwelling upon the discrepancy of growth between such counties as Harford which almost stagnates, and Allegany and other Republican counties that are booming, and declare that the returns must have been pruned in one case and padded in the other to suit the exigencies of the Republicans.

There is not the slightest proof of this, but the Democrats are doing a great deal of figuring, and they are putting forth vague stories about enumerators in Harford county losing their books and making up their enumerations from memory. Such figuring is naturally more agreeable to Democrats than figuring out election returns that show that McKinley had a plurality of nearly 7000 in the State outside of Baltimore. How to disfranchise without disfranchising too much, how to lay upon the negroes the responsibility for Maryland's Republicanism when negroes are scarce in Western Maryland and constitute but a small percentage of the population of Baltimore, are some of the problems that will confront an extra session of the Maryland Legislature assembled to agree on a method of manacling and muzzling the voters.

The illiteracy test in a State of the general cultivation of Maryland will not cut deep, and if it cuts at all, not in the strong Republican counties. To complicate the ballot itself will work as much hardship to the Democrats as to the Republicans. To gerrymander a State in which party lines are no longer sectional is always difficult and might in this instance be futile, for the wealth, industry and education of Maryland has a cultivated apprehension of anything that suggests a possible return of Gormanism to power. If the Democrats undertake disfranchisement they must go at it in a way that will at once expose to the country their fear of fair play, and will rouse all the antagonism to Gormanism which may yet remain latent in Maryland.—Boston Transcript.

Aid for Maryland Roads.

The movement that has been inaugurated in Baltimore county to reconstruct the old and construct new roads under the supervision of a competent road engineer has had an excellent effect throughout the State where the seed of interest in the utility of good roads has already been sown to good effect by the Highways Division of the Maryland Geological Survey. In Frederick, Harford and Washington counties the services of the experts of the Highways Division have been taken advantage of by the County Commissioners, who have invited their co-operation and arranged the expenditure of the road funds to comply with the modern requirements for road improvement. There has been no decided rush to extend the roads of the counties, but the idea of making the best use of the public moneys available for road improvement has been adopted, and it is likely that in the future the roads of the State will become what they ought to be—safe, solid, substantial highways for the traffic of the farmers, and procured at a cost certainly not greater, and in some instances less, than they have involved for years past under the old system.

In Allegany county, the Commissioners have received a letter from Congressman Pearre offering to procure for them through the Agricultural Department the services of one of its agents to instruct the people in the method and superintend the making of model highways. It is proposed to construct under their supervision a sample of roadway from a quarter of a mile to a mile in length over the most traveled portion of the county, in order that the people may see the advantages of properly constructed roads and have the idea of construction followed out in all road-building in the county hereafter. The county is to bear the expense of constructing the sample road, but the services of the Government experts are to be given free to the Allegany countians. In this way the county will secure the benefits of the scientific knowledge these men have of road-making. The awakening to the good-roads movement has been slow in this State, but there has always been a strong sentiment in favor of better highways among the enterprising farmers. Not until the present time has it been possible to secure State and Government aid in the furtherance of good road-building. It is creditable to the public spirit of the men controlling these interests in the counties that they have been prompt in their recognition of the opportunity that presents itself for bringing the roads of their districts up to the very best standard.—Balto. News.

Are You Drifting?

Are you drifting along in life with only vague, meager aims and no real prospect of anything better than your present environment, your present opportunities and your present achievements? Do you expect to go on as you are doing and to reap the natural harvest of your listless, indefinite thinking and misapplied labor? If so, no wonder you are dull, torpid, discouraged. No wonder you think nothing pays and life isn't worth the candle. Wake up a bit! Look out upon the glorious earth with its infinite variety of interests, its stupendous array of elemental, mineral, vegetable, animal and human peculiarities and individualities. Get your eyes open and view all that falls in the range of your vision, with a child's wonderment and a child's faculty of seeing that which delights. Avoid seeing those things which annoy or offend; they tire you. Look for that which amuses and pleases; it will rest you. In the infinite of nature one has a choice between the thoughts that are tiresome and the thoughts that are restful. There are elements of beauty in the plainest of pictures. There are redeeming traits in the most antipathetic of our acquaintances. There is hope even in desperate situations. It depends upon the way we look at things. Moods make or break us. Abjure your dyspeptic mood, your vinegar mood, your porcupine mood, your weary, weary mood, and live a new thought life. You will find the change ever so restful and refreshing. Forget yourself, get outside of yourself and be interested in your surroundings or in thoughts of impersonal matters. Thus you will draw to you more of the bounding life of the universe and not be eating your soul out by grieving over your wants and your limitations.

Remember that this is a world of infinite resources and unlimited possibilities, and that your own happiness, your own peace and content, must depend upon the healthful activity of your mind. There is nothmore wonderful than the joy and rest which come to one as a result of thinking the right thought and of catching the inspiration of a new hope. No use in turning the old thoughts over and over. That is not thinking in the true sense of the word. Rather keep your eyes open, your mind active and discriminating. Snatch at the new ideas; consider them; throw them aside if need be, but be on the outlook for others; and soon new thoughts, new hopes, new dreams and new experiences will flock to you in battalions.

Reapportionment in West Virginia.

The Republicans of the West Virginia legislature have agreed on a plan for the apportionment of the five Congressional districts. The second district which borders on the Sixth district of Maryland will be composed of Barbour, Upsur, Berkely, Grant, Hampshire, Hardy, Jefferson, Mineral, Monongalia, Morgan, Pendleton, Preston, Randolph, Taylor and Tucker counties.

Extra Session Talk.

A correspondent of the Baltimore News writing under date of January 26th, thus treats the much talked-of call of the Governor for an extra session of the Maryland Legislature:

The interview with Governor Smith recently reported in a morning paper appears to be an apology in advance for the extraordinary session of the Legislature he proposes to call. The reasons he advances and the manner of stating them reveal our Executive as a pronounced weakling, apparently under the control of a stronger and perhaps unseen hand.

His first excuse is a desire to abolish bribery. This crime has existed for more than a score of years, largely in Worcester county, his own home, and few men in the State have had more or better opportunities than he has had to know the full extent of this lawless practice; and perhaps a portion of his princely contributions to the campaign fund of 1899 that assisted in his own election may have been expended by some of his wicked political partners to bribe the voters of the Eastern Shore, for it is a fact that the peerless Bryan secured nearly 2000 less votes in this portion of the State in 1890 than the sage of Worcester received in 1899. The other counties of the State where vote-buying is not largely known as a political accomplishment show no such relative fluctuation. It was currently reported during last fall that the Democratic party had no election funds east of the bay, as it had spent all of its available cash in 1899.

No one doubts the natural affiliation of the colored vote. Those who can read, as well as the illiterate, are with the Republican party; hence the buying of any part of the vote must of necessity commence with the party that has not got it, but wants it. And this is Governor Smith's party. The conditions now existing are not new. Why did not our zealous Governor use his great influence with the last Legislature, which has been away from the Capital less than 10 months, not long enough for its malodorous record to be forgotten? Did not the Sun say editorially on April 2, 1900: "The Legislature of Maryland adjourns at midnight to-night. If it had never met, the people of Maryland and the Democratic party would have been better off. The Democratic Legislature of 1900 'takes the cake' as a body utterly out of touch with the people and conspicuously indifferent to public interests. Besides 'taking the cake' it might just as well have taken everything else in sight, including the State House, which seems to have become of no further use to the people. The result of this legislative session may be a 'grand inquest' by the people on the Democratic party at the next State election." This body, so forcibly described by the Sun, was succeptible to the Governor's influence. Why did he not promote the passage of the corrupt-practices act? It would have become a law had he so desired.

The Improvement of Public Roads.

The avidity with which the boards of commissioners of the various counties of the State are taking advantage of the opportunity offered by the Highway Division of the Maryland Geological Survey to obtain the assistance of the officers of that department in planning for the remodeling of the public highways is a credit to their good sense and public spirit. The other day in Frederick, the Commissioners agreed to invite the co-operation of the Highway Division in laying out a considerable stretch of road in that county, and Monday the Harford County Commissioners passed a resolution accepting the proffer of the department to assist in the preliminary work of laying out a section of model road provided for under the Woolsey bequest for good roads to Harford county.

It has taken some time to arouse the Commissioners to the fact that scientific road-building is as important to the farmer and the tax-payers' interests as scientific farming or scientific dairying, but with the awakening has come an abundance of zeal for the benefits to be derived from the modern system of road construction. It will be some years, perhaps before Maryland has the number and kind of highways she ought to have to give her distinction in this direction, but with county after county falling into the spirit of the movement the future of the public highways is undoubtedly assured. Much of the awakening in this direction is due to the missionary work that has been done by the Geological Survey, a fact which the farmers and the County Commissioners are manifesting a very great willingness to admit. The result has already proved the wisdom of the creation of the survey, the money expended upon which is being returned to the tax-payers in benefits that they might otherwise have waited years to acquire. The counties are beginning to realize that it is just as easy, and hardly any more expensive in the end, to have good roads as bad ones. This point reached, the remainder of the work of converting the highways of the State into fine roadways ought to be comparatively easy to accomplish. The counties that have taken the iniatory step in the matter have set an excellent example for the rest of the State to follow.—Baltimore News.

The African in the Woodpile.

When the reasons in favor of an extra session of the legislature have been exhausted the unanswerable fact still remains that no such urgency as would justify the governor in calling the General Assembly together exists. The prosperity and welfare of the state are not at present more seriously menaced by the venality of the illiterate voter than at any previous time. If a conspiracy, conceived in ignorance and corruption and directed against Maryland's institutions, threatens, the extra session advocates have so far failed to produce any evidence thereof. They seem not even to have thought of advancing such a preposterous assertion, and appear to consider the circumstance that they have the power to take whatever action they please in the premises quite sufficient for their purpose.

As a matter of fact, the influence of the illiterate voter in Maryland affairs is distinctly less potential than in previous years, and must steadily wane with the advance of education. At each election the number of votes cast by citizens unable to read and write grows smaller, and before long it will be reduced to insignificant proportions without restrictive legislation. More than this, it is undeniably true and will be conceded by every fairminded person that the will of the people finds more adequate expression at the polls than at any previous time. If vote buying is practiced—and a general disposition prevails to concede as much—the number of votes for sale has been larger in past campaigns than now, and is certain to undergo constant diminution. That the adoption of the modified Australian ballot system has contributed signally to the purification of political contests and correspondingly narrowed the opportunities and barter is too patent for argument.

Such being admittedly the case, what excuse can be offered for saddling upon the state the expense of an extra session? Have the Representatives in the legislature from the counties become so generous that they are willing to saddle the taxpayers with an outlay of perhaps $80,000, chiefly in order that the city of Baltimore may be able to build sewers without further delay? One might suppose from all the clamor which has been raised that the illiterates throughout Maryland, actuated by a common impulse, have banded themselves together to overthrow the party now in power, and that they must be speedily disfranchised as a means of averting a veritable calamity. No Marylander with the slightest knowledge of local conditions will advance so ridiculous a plea, which could be rightly construed as an insult to intelligence.

Not a single one of the pretexts put forward in support of an extra session deserves a moment's consideration. Closer examination serves to divest them of all force, and nothing remains except the underlying motive—the expectation that disfranchisement will deliver the state over to a combination of conscienceless ringsters—a consummation in which patriotic and public spirited citizens may well hesitate to assist.

The petition is signed by Beatty's neighbors.

Old People Made Young.

J. C. Sherman, the veteran editor of the Vermontville (Mich.) Echo, has discovered the remarkable secret of keeping old people young. For years he has avoided Nervousness, Sleeplessness, Indigestion, Heart trouble, Constipation and Rheumatism, by using Electric Bitters, and he writes: "It can't be praised too highly. It gently stimulates the kidneys, tones the stomach, aids digestion, and gives a splendid appetite. It has worked wonders for my wife and me. It's a marvellous remedy for old people's complaints." A Frenchman Killed.

Francis Yerris, a Frenchman, aged 45 years, employed by R. F. Whitmer & Co., as woodsman, near Wallman, on the West Virginia Central railway, was killed Thursday night by a logging engine, three miles from the mill. The dead man had the name Elris tattooed on his arm, and besides a small amount of money, had several letters on his person from a New York lawyer advising him to return at once to France and receive a large sum of money left him by a wealthy relative.

THE BEST THEY KNOW.

YOU remember the old lady who rode for the first time on a railway train. There was a frightful collision, but when the rescuers reached her she was quite calm. She said she supposed they always stopped that way. The story well illustrates why so many women are satisfied to live without Ivory Soap. They have never tried it! Naturally enough, they think that annoying odors, sharp chemicals, and wasteful greasiness are common to all soaps.

THE GOVERNMENT WILL AID.

Representative Pearre is Anxious That Allegany Have Good Roads.

Representative George A. Pearre of the Sixth Maryland district, has written the members of the board of Allegany county commissioners to lay before them a suggestion, which he thinks will be of great benefit to the county. Under an existing law there is a division of road inquiries attached to the Agricultural Department. The purpose of the establishment of this division is to ascertain the best methods of making roads in the various states, and to lend such aid as may be in its power and within the appropriations of Congress to the various states in model road making. This branch of the inquiry and work in connection with the Agricultural Department is new, and Col. Pearre is anxious that the people of Allegany county should have the benefit of the scientific knowledge, which the experts of the Agricultural Department possess.

Col. Pearre believes that he can arrange, through the Agricultural Department, to send one of its agents to Allegany county to instruct the people in this work, and to superintend the making of a sample piece of road, say a quarter of a mile, a half a mile or a mile in length. The expense of providing material and labor, of course, must be borne by the county, but the government sends its men and pays their expenses. If the county commissioners are now engaged in improving any portion of the county roads, it might be well to arrange to have a sample road constructed in some portion of the public highways in the coming spring.

Col. Pearre suggests that the board take some action looking to this result and communicate with him in order that he may have a definite basis upon which to work at the Department of Agriculture. The benefit of this work will arise from the fact that while it is being done, the people may be present and learn the best methods of road making, which in the future they can follow.

New Three Cent Piece.

A new coin, 3-cent piece, has been authorized by act of Congress to take the place of the old coin, which was so much like a dime that its coinage was stopped. The new 3-cent piece is ordered to be made of nickel, the size of an old bronze cent, only thicker. In the center there is to be a hole one-fourth of an inch in diameter. This will make the coin more easily distinguished by sight or touch.

Hebrews May Be Disfranchised.

Prominent Hebrews of Baltimore have joined the opposition to the scheme for an extra session of the legislature to pass the educational qualification bill. While the proposed law is directed solely to disfranchising the negroes, it has been found that thousands of Hebrews in Baltimore will be affected by it. State Senator Jacob Moses, who is a Democratic politician, says that only about five hundred Jews will be barred by the proposed law, but Dr. Aaron Friedenwald, who is well known among the Hebrews of Baltimore, and who is a trustee of the Baron de Hirsch Fund in Baltimore, said: "I think that from five to six thousand Hebrew voters live in the lower wards of the city, and that a large proportion of them would be completely at sea in an election booth, with no emblems to guide them and no assistance extended to them by the ballot clerks."

Rheumatism.

Nobody knows all about it; and nothing, now known, will always cure it.

Doctors try Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil, when they think it is caused by imperfect digestion of food. You can do the same.

It may or may not be caused by the failure of stomach and bowels to do their work. If it is, you will cure it; if not, you will do no harm.

The way, to cure a disease is to stop its cause, and help the body get back to its habit of health.

When Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil does that, it cures; when it don't, it don't cure. It never does harm.

The genuine has this picture on it, take no other.

If you have not tried it, send for free sample, its agreeable taste will surprise you.

She will return to Oakland about April 1st.

Some of these days several men of this city, who are in the habit of rubbering at every opportunity, will break their necks while screwing their heads to look into other people's business. A case in point happened on Market street yesterday morning which illustrated how many men will stop to crook their necks by watching what is going on. A pretty young lady was walking hurridly along the street when she felt something part in the back. Instantly her right hip fell like a punctured bicycle tire, making her left one look ridiculous by contrast. Thereupon every man on the street stopped to rubber, and quite a crowd gathered before the humiliated girl could escape to the shelter of a neighboring millinery store.—Parkersburg State Journal.

This community is being flooded just now with printed matter setting forth the advantages of the new gasolene lamps being manufactured in different sections of the country. If the lamps will do all that is claimed for them by their makers they will come into general use before many months roll round, thus displacing the kerosene lamps and electric lights. Already there are a number of the new lamps in use in Oakland which seem to give general satisfaction.

In a letter to the Manufacturers' Record, Baltimore, Messrs. Jennings Bros., of Lopez, Pa., write that they expect to begin track laying upon a railroad they are building in Garrett county, Maryland, between Niverton and Bittinger, in the spring. It is stated that it is intended to open the other coal beds, and that saw mills and other industries will be located along the line.

A lady drummer, selling shoes for a wholesale house, was in Oakland Monday. She was quite petite, and got around among our merchants in quick order. She carried a couple of good sized sample cases, and gave strict attention to business. She wore a rainy day skirt, a neat fitting seal skin jacket and her dress was appropriate and in good taste for a traveling woman. She looked after her baggage in a quiet, dignified manner, showing she was experienced in traveling. She did not make one-tenth the fuss that a big fat male drummer would make, one of the kind who takes everything by storm and blows like a wind mill and kicks everything.

One of the very latest triumphs of human ingenuity is the counterfeit vaccination scar. It is manufactured and sold by an enterprising resident of Goshen, N. J. In that town there are many persons who are opposed to vaccination, believing that it often introduces other diseases into the systems. These are patrons of the counterfeiter. The "scar" is in the form of a very delicate plaster, cunningly tinted and marked as to deceive the eye. It is said that 200 school children wearing these bogus marks "passed."

The statement going the rounds of the press that a vein of bituminous coal fifty feet thick had been discovered in Randolph county is without foundation—merely a pipe dream. The coal alluded to in the papers runs fro n seven to nine feet in thickness and is the Upper-Freeport vein. It lies in Mingo district, and is as fine a specimen of the Freeport coal as there is in America. The prominent young attorney who gave the fifty feet in thickness story to the press was simply misinformed.—Elkins Enterprise.

D. E. Bolden, of the firm of Bolden & Brown, furniture and undertaking, Oakland, spent several days in Terra Alta during the past week, looking up a business location, it being the intention of the firm to establish a branch of their business at this place. They will most probably erect a building on the Odd Fellows' lot opposite Hotel Dunnington, Washington st. The same to run the entire length of the lot. The new erection will have an iron front and plate glass windows, and will be quite an improvement to that section of the town.—Terra Alta corr. Kingwood Argus.

Success in business is not to be reached nowadays in the easy-going method that obtained a generation or two ago. Times have changed and people have changed with them. Push is the only thing that will carry a man ahead, and it is the liveliest pusher that gets there first. As a general rule the chronic pusher is the chronic advertiser. Printer's ink is the lubricating oil of his business wheels, and he never allows them to creak or grow rusty for want of it. Hard times and poor business are incentives to increasing his advertising, rather than any argument to him for cutting it down. It will pay the semi-occasional advertiser to ponder over the pusher's success.—Printer's Ink.

Mr. Frank Draper, under the auspices of Zion's Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society, publishers of Millennial Dawn Series, etc., will give one of his very interesting Bible discourses in Odd Fellows' Hall, Loch Lynn, Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock and Sunday evening at 7 o'clock. Also at Sturgiss' Hall, Oakland, on Monday evening at 7 o'clock. Mr. Draper having spoken in this city on previous occasions, needs no recommendation, other than that his clear knowledge of scripture, together with his positive and harmonious use of the same cannot fail to interest and benefit any who may be present and who may have ears to hear. You are invited; no collection.

A Severe Storm.

Friday last marked the beginning of the winter in earnest in this section, when the snow fell to the depth of an inch or two. On Saturday an inch or more fell and then on Sunday there was a continuous fall. Along toward night the wind rose to a gale and continued during the night with no let up all day Monday, which resulted in the closing of the roads to such an extent that the mail from Accident failed to reach Oakland, the carrier getting as far as McHenry, ry, when he was compelled to return to Accident. Aside from the cold, cutting wind, the weather was not at all unpleasant during the three or four days.

The owners of a coal mine in the vicinity of Deer Park have entered into an agreement whereby a forfeit of $25 is worked should any of them sell coal for less than $1 per ton or deliver it without the cash—a sort of trust. MICKEY FINN AND THE BUMBLE BEE

By Ernest Jarrold.

(Copyright, 1900, by Doubleday & McClure Co.)

As a delineator of Irish character Ernest Jarrold has had but few equals. His "Mickey Finn" stories have been read throughout the entire English speaking world, and have everywhere been popular. The late C. A. Dana said of them: "They contain the most admirable delineation of character, together with a rare felicity in the description of the woods and fields." The following story is taken from one of Mr. Jarrold's books recently published by Jamieson-Higgins Co., Chicago.

The air of Cooney Island palpitated with the fervent heat of a day in July. The hot air radiated up from the meadows and the dusty road like heat from a furnace. Even the chickens sought the shade of friendly trees, and the locusts lazily chanted their midsummer threnody as Mickey Finn came down Murray street with a tattered geography, a worn spelling book and a thumbed first reader under his arm.

The boy's face shone from its recent application of soft soap and water, so that the freckles stood out like spots of brick dust on either side of his nose. He had a stone bruise on one of his toes, and was forced to walk on one heel. As he limped along the roadside, half a mile away in the hazy perspective he could see the little red schoolhouse in the hollow, with its monotonous suggestions of: "Can-the-dog-catch-the-cat? Yes-the-dog-can-catch-the-cat."

In fancy he heard the dreary iteration of the schoolroom, and saw the blank white walls speckled with paper "spit-balls." He was hot and tired and dusty, and his toe hurt. The truth was, that he had asked his mother to permit him to stay away from school, and she refused to allow him to do so. Mrs. Finn's attention had been pathetically drawn to the sore toe, and she had said that the injured member would not hurt him any more at school than at home. And so the boy looked cross and felt ugly towards the distasteful "eddication," which his mother forced upon him. As he limped along the dusty road, he looked off over the meadow and saw the maples and pines in Lindsley's wood whispering to each other, as they waved in the breeze which blew fresh and cool from the Hudson river. These whispers Mickey interpreted as coaxing invitations, which sounded to him as follows:

"Come, little Mike, and lie under our protecting branches! Here you will find the tender birch bark and the juicy sassafras root! Upon our shady hillocks hidden by glossy green leaves, hide the red wintergreen berries awaiting your coming! The tree toad will sing his little song for you, the bubbling spring is distilling a sparkling liquor for your thirsty lips, and the shady coverts of our sylvan dells await you!"

With these enchanting voices in his ear the temptation to play hookey was a strong one. The tempter of men came to him with the liquid melody of birds, the soft wooing of fluttering leaves, the rustle of the pine's thin fingers, and the gurgle of brooks. And as he stood in the dusty road and looked down into the hollow at the sun beating fiercely upon the windows of the little red schoolhouse, and realized how stifling was the air inside, what wonder that he hesitated!

Then the reproachful face of his mother rose before him. As little Mike loved his mother and feared her rebuke more than he did her heavy hand, the thought of her grief impelled him onward toward the school. But he could not shut out of his mental sight the picture of the cool paradise in the wood where the little lake rippled in the sunlight, and where, far below, ran the wide reaches of the Hudson river as it loitered to the sea. And in this entrancing picture his mother's face was blotted out as with a sponge from the slate of his mind; the schoolhouse was forgotten and he limped eagerly toward the stone wall to which clung the riotous wild raspberry bushes laden with fruit. Forgotten was the sore toe, lost sight of was the long, black strap hanging on the kitchen wall, and left behind was the dusty road and all the suggestions of work

On arriving at the summit of the hill little Mike turned in his tracks and looked down upon the schoolhouse. He saw the master come to the door and ring the bell, and his schoolmates scamper like corralled sheep into the building. Then the door was shut and Mickey realized that his sin was irrevocable. He trembled, too, when he thought that he would have to make confession to the priest. But it was too late to retrace his steps. He was now in the narrow path leading to the woods. He took off his tattered cap and the cool fingers of the breezes lifted the hair from his forehead. As he sat down on the grass a striped chipmunk stopped, palpitating, on the stone wall, and little Mike's fingers itched for his bow-gun. After hiding his books in the stone wall and covering them with dead leaves he began picking and eating raspberries until his bronzed cheeks were covered with the juices of the fruit. The scent of clover blooms and fresh grasses made his notrils dilate, and while the birds sang for him from the trees the nodding buttercups and daisies shook their heads at him and seemed to say:

"Little boy, you're playing hookey!"

When Mickey entered the woods he lay down upon the brown needles at the foot of the pine trees and watched the butterflies flitting over him on yellow wings. And as he lay there the luxury of indolence stole in upon his senses and the gentle soughing of the pines fell with a soothing influence upon his ear. The drowsy hum of bees and the inarticulate voices of the wood lulled him to sleep. How long he lay there Mickey could not tell. He was rudely awakened by a big black ant which had crawled up his trousers leg, and a great yellow, hairy caterpillar crossing the bridge of his nose. As he sat up and brushed away these insects a cat-bird in a tree near by began to jeer at him with what to Mickey's excited fancy were the words:

"Playing hookey! Playing hookey!"

In some mysterious manner gladness seemed to go out of the day for little Mike at this cruel taunt. The odors of the flowers were just as sweet as they had been before, the moss at the foot of the pine trees was as vivid a green, the swallows dipped as gracefully over the field of billowy wheat, but the charm of all this beauteous panorama was gone. His toe began to hurt again. With drooping head and limping gait, Mickey plunged deeper into the woods. At the foot of a big rock he found a spring. Lying at full length upon the sward he put his lips down to the water and drank deep of the champagne of the woods. The reflection of his face in the spring grinned sardonically at him. And from the brown eyes shining from the cool depths came a reproachful glance which seemed to say:

"The leather strap is waiting for you in the kitchen!"

All that afternoon he wandered through the woods seeking happiness, but finding none. He flew for refuge to the birch tree, but the bark had lost all its old-time sweetness. The sassafras root which often had tasted like honey in his mouth now took on the flavor of worm-wood. As he retraced his steps to the stone wall where he had hidden his books the awful consciousness came to him that he would be obliged to tell a lie in order to escape a whipping. Like a thief in the night he sneaked down the steep hillside up which he had climbed so cheerfully in the morning, and five minutes later entered the shanty. So downcast was he and so furtive in manner that his mother's attention was attracted to him. Just at this moment a big bumble bee wearing a black velvet vest with yellow stripes blundered into the room.

"Are ye sick, Mickey?" said his mother, solicitously.

"No; I'm not sick, mother," said little Mike, "but me toe is hurtin' me."

"Well, what makes ye act so quare?"

This was uttered in such a tone of solicitude and with so kindly a look that little Mike's eyes began to overflow as his mother tried to "shoo" the bumble bee out of the room.

"I'm glad you're not a wicked little boy, Mickey, like thim Doolans," continued Mrs. Finn. "If ye were I'd be thinkin' that bumble bee would be afther stingin' ye. Shure that's what bumble bees does be doin'—stingin' little boys fur their sins!"

Slap went the end of Mrs. Finn's apron against the wall and away sailed the bee out of the window like an animated jewel of jet and amber.

Little Mike was oppressed with fears. The haunting consciousness of wrong-doing weighed him down like the guilt of a murderer. He felt a great load taken off his conscience when the bumble bee flew out of the window, for he believed implicitly that the insect had flown into the shanty for the purpose of stinging him because he had played "hookey." He busied himself about the yard, milking the goat and chopping wood. He was so unusually zealous and quiet in this work, that his mother's suspicions were awakened.

"Faix," said she, "I'm afeerd me little boy's been up to mischief, he's actin' that quare. Shure, he has berry stains on his face, an' there's no berries at school. Musha, I'm afther thinkin' he was playin' hookey!"

Just then Mickey came into the shanty with another armful of wood. His mother looked at him closely, unobserved by the boy, and saw that his knees were stained with grass juice and that to the back of his jacket clung some tell-tale pine needles. But she kept her own counsel and awaited developments, satisfied that Mickey would confess his guilt. Another armful of wood had been thrown under the stove, and little Mike looked up to catch the expected approving glance of his mother, when Mrs. Finn cried in alarm:

"Look out, Mickey; here comes the bumble bee fur ye!"

Again the fears of the boy were awakened, and turning quickly he struck a frantic blow at the bee. This evidently angered the insect, for it avoided the blow, flew over the boy's head and stung him on the back of the neck. Having punished the truant and satisfied its vengeance the bumble bee flew out of the door. As Mrs. Finn bound a handful of mud upon the swelling wound little Mike looked up in his mother's face, and, with trembling voice full of remorse and pain, said in a hoarse whisper:

"M-m-mother!"

"Yes, Mickey," said Mrs. Finn, knowing that the time of confession had come. The boy continued with quivering lips:

"I know why the bee s-s-tung me. Bekase I—bekase—mother—I—I—I was playin'—play—playin' hookey!"

As he hid his face in his mother's dress she stooped over him and her lips touched the bronzed, berry-stained face in the fond kiss of forgiveness. As her warm breath dried the brine upon his cheek the bumble bee buried itself for shame in a blue and white morning glory which hung like an infant bell over the doorway.

WERE BORN TO LEAD

Historic Quartette of Giants in the Thirty-Fourth Congress.

Sumner, Morrill, Brooks and Breckenridge Were, Physically and Mentally, the Greatest Men of Their Day.

[Special Washington Letter.]

"I TOLD you all about the fires days when I was a fireman," in Washington in the early said Calhoun Clark, the retired veteran fire-fighter. "At the same time I promised to tell you about my experiences as a little page boy in the old house of representatives. To-night I am in a humor to fulfill that promise.

"It was in 1855 that I was appointed, and I guess you and your readers were babes in arms then; I mean the eldest of your readers, as well as yourself. I was a lively little lad then, and these gray whiskers were not even sprouting, while this bald head was covered with a thick growth of dark brown hair. I was only one of about a dozen page boys, but I was very observant of everything about me, because I had been told that I must study the men, and know how to anticipate the desires and wishes of all of the statesmen, if I would make myself popular and keep my position.

"My vivid recollection of that time is the fact that the most handsome and distinguished-looking men in the house were the four giants—Morrill, of Vermont; Sumner, of Massachusetts; Breckenridge, of Kentucky, and Brooks, of South Carolina. Two of them were from the north and two of them from the south. I do not believe that at any time in the history of congress four men of such magnificent physique and intellect have appeared in the house of representatives.

"Brooks, of South Carolina, was about six feet tall, and as perfectly formed a man as ever lived. Morrill, of Vermont, who remained in public life until he passed away about two years ago, was by far the handsomest man of them all, but not quite so robust physically as the others. He had a classic face and his power of utterance was marvelous. Breckenridge, of Kentucky, was about Morrill's height, but heavier. The biggest man of the quartette was Sumner. He was about six feet five inches tall, and must have weighed about 200 pounds. There was no fat about him. He was all big bone and muscle. He dressed well, too. He was the best dressed man in congress. He dressed to show off his physical proportions. He was an athlete, and kept a little gymnasium in his apartments. He swung dumb-bells and Indian clubs every morning, and he took long walks every day.

"I can see Sumner now, walking down Pennsylvania avenue to the capitol, in creased trousers, with cutaway coat and white vest. He always wore a white vest. They call it waistcoat nowadays, but it was a vest then, and it would make a dress coat for a man of ordinary size. I have seen prize-fighters in recent years, and I believe, as I told you before, that if Sumner lived to-day, and were a scientific boxer, he could take Jeffries, and Corbett, and Sharkey, and bump their heads together He used to walk down Pennsylvania avenue alone, and everybody looked at him as a physical wonder. It was not very long until they were also pointing at him as an intellectual prodigy. As a southern boy, I did not like him, because he was always hammering away at slavery and denouncing southern states because they upheld that institution. Being but little more than a child, I did not understand his great purpose as I do now.

"I was still here after Sumner went to the senate, and I remember well when Brooks attacked him in that chamber. That story has never been truthfully told in print. At any rate, I have never seen it truthfully told. The current story is that Brooks struck Sumner with a heavy cane, and that he almost killed him while he was at his desk in the senate, after an adjournment. That is absolutely false. I was in the senate chamber a few minutes after the occurrence, and picked up the shattered cane which Brooks used in his attack upon Sumner. If I had known that it would become of historic value I would have kept it. But I didn't, and so I smoked it."

In reply to inquiry concerning this peculiar statement, the old man said: "The boys in those days used to smoke fibrous wood called rattan. It would burn like a cigar. It was full of pores, and the smoke easily ran through it. Brooks carried a rattan cane with an ornamental silver handle. It was very light and in no sense a murderous weapon. I do not remember the cause of the trouble, but Brooks felt personally aggrieved and went to Sumner in the senate chamber and demanded an apology for something which Sumner had said in debate. Sumner looked up and said he had nothing to apologize for, and Brooks struck him over the head with his light cane, shattering the cane.

"Now, I was very sure at that time that Brooks simply intended to provoke the giant from Massachusetts into a personal fight or a duel, and that has always since been my impression. I believe he expected Sumner to arise and grapple with him in a personal fight, or to resort to a duel. But the blow stunned Sumner, and he fell back on his chair and seemed to be almost dying. The word passed quickly about the capitol, and I was one of the first to rush into the chamber. Brooks had gone, and I picked up the shattered cane. Nobody ever called for it; and, as I said, I cut it up and smoked pieces of it with the boys. That is what became of the shattered cane which would now be a historic thing, if it were in existence.

"As a matter of fact the blow which Brooks delivered was harder than he intended it to be, and it lacerated Sumner's scalp, and put him to bed. But I know very well that it did not fracture his skull, as reports have said, and it caused him inconvenience only for a few days. The difficulty was not, as the newspapers and historians have said, 'a murderous assault.' Brooks was not a man to commit murder, although he would fight a duel with anybody.

"But that episode helped to inflame the differences between the northern and southern states, and it had more to do with bringing on the civil war than any other one thing, except Mrs. Stowe's novel, "Uncle Tom's Cabin." That story alone would be interesting. I was here when that book was published. I heard many representatives from southern states say that the book was dangerous and likely to produce harm, and some of them thought it ought to be suppressed.

"Well all of those handsome men have gone to their long home, and I am still here. Breckenridge was the kindest man of the quartette. He remembered the names of the little page boys. He gave them little bits of change for their services. There were no cigarettes then, but we had other ways of getting rid of our extra money. He always spoke to us in a kindly manner. Consequently the boys all believed in him and loved him.

"Mr. Morrill went to the senate and was the foremost man in that body during the civil war. He framed the war tariff bill of 1863; and I remember that while he was engaged in that great work I went to the senate one day with an official document to deliver to the secretary of the senate, and Senator Morrill called me to him, gave me a silver quarter, and told me that he remembered me as a good boy over in the house.

"Brooks was never very considerate of the boys, and we did not like him particularly well. Mr. Sumner was also indifferent to us. Consequently, when Brooks attacked Sumner we page boys had no ground of sympathy on either side. We didn't care particularly for either Brooks or Sumner. Hence, you will see, that it was not then nor is not now a matter of prejudice when I say that the sentiment at that time was not against Brooks, for nobody believed that he intended to hurt Sumner as much as he did when he struck him with that rattan cane.

"When the civil war came on those big men divided on geographical lines. Brooks and Breckenridge went into the confederacy, while Sumner and Morrill remained with the government. Morrill had no aspirations other than for the general welfare, but Sumner was a candidate for the presidency as long as he lived. He would have been a great president; but, like Douglas, and many other great men that I have known, his ambitions in that direction were not gratified. It was not so written, and Sumner died as unhappy a man as Blaine did, covered with honors and fame, but without the one particular honor which he most desired.

"All of these little details concerning those men may be interesting to you and your readers, but the thing which stands out in my memory most prominently and which you cannot comprehend is the fact that those four men were the biggest men physically that have ever come together at any one time in any congress; and that they all proved to be intellectual as well as physical giants. I have seen many congresses and many aggregations of great men, but I believe that the four greatest and most distinguished-looking men that ever came together here in the national capital were Sumner, of Massachusetts; Morrill, of Vermont; Brooks, of South Carolina, and Breckenridge, of Kentucky, in the Thirty-fourth congress."

YOUNG BUT PLUCKY RIDER.

A Courageous Lad Who Follows the Hounds with the Enthusiasm of a Veteran.

In a hunting community not far from this city there is a son of one of the members who seems destined to throw a famous leg over the pigskin. That is, it will be famous if the recklessness of its owner permits it to come to maturity. His courage is of the first water, his nerve without limit, but he is only 11, and his discretion leaves something to be desired. Once the ardor of the chase is on him, his father says, he will put his "gee" at anything in his path, even if it should happen to be a church. He has until recently ridden to hounds on his pony, but so clever was his work that the attention of the master of fox hounds was attracted and he gave the boy recently a leg upon one of his own hunters. The horse was rangey, half-bred, 17½ hands high and with a temper of his own, says the New York Tribune.

After they were in the field the master of fox hounds remembered the hunter's peculiarities of temper, and his heart misgave him. The boy was excited and happy, but he looked a bit lonely and forlorn seated on the huge horse, and the master of fox hounds decided to ride close at hand and to keep a careful eye on him. After the hounds found all seemed to go well, however, and the master of fox hounds forgot his good intentions as his sporting blood rose. Suddenly he remembered and looked around just in time to see the boy put his mount at a five-barred gate. The horse refused, and up his neck the youngster slid. He grabbed wildly, and his tiny arms went round the horse's neck. So close was the horse that his head was over the gate he had refused, and as the boy slid off he struck the top bar. To this he hung, and as the frightened master of fox hounds rode up he held up his hand. "Please, Mr. Blank, does that count as a fall?" he demanded. "I didn't touch ground." "Why, no, Reggie," said the master of fox hounds, as he disguised a laugh in a cough, "I don't think that ought to count as a fall. Are you hurt?" "Not a bit," was the cheerful response, "and now, if you'll lead him up I'll mount from here and then I won't have to touch ground." He did, and was in at the death, and anything he wants in that club now is his, from the best hunter in its stables to the mastership of the hounds when he grows up.

Why the Empress Went to War.

At the beginning of the year 1900 Tsze Hsi An (the empress dowager) was harassed on every side. All her experience in the evasion of danger pointed toward the shedding of blood as the only certain means of success. It seems as if she had adopted as motto the gory platform of Robespierre: "Il n'y a que les morts qui ne reviennent pas." That was the only solution which she was able to discover, and she seized upon it with avidity. Her experience was not broad enough to forecast the result, while her superstition, ignorance and hope led her to accept the supposed invulnerability of the Boxers as an established fact. When that illusion vanished and the allies appeared at T'ung Chow, 14 miles from Peking, she fled, taking with her 69 carts filled with the most valuable wealth, and poor Kaung Hsu, who was to serve as a hostage for her own safety and immunity.—R. Van Bergen, in Atlantic.

WITHOUT THE FRILLS.

Report of a Church Wedding by an Editor Who Discountenances Frippery.

An editor who was thoroughly tired of the foolishness that goes on at a church wedding finally got even as follows, says the Atchison Globe man: "They were married in great style. All the elite of the town were invited, principally because it was thought that they would be more likely to bring elegant presents for the bride.

"Of course, the ceremony took place in the church, and the church was most beautifully decorated for the occasion. Potted plants were borrowed here and there, wherever they could be secured without making the owner mad enough to fight.

"The bride's young lady friends had the decorations in charge, and when they were not making nosegays they were chewing the rag about the trouble and work, and wishing that the bride had sense enough to get up her own wedding. The ushers wore claw-hammer coats, parted their hair in the middle and stepped high when they walked down the aisle. The coats were hired from a costumer, and their white gloves came from an undertaker's, who kept them on hand for funeral occasions.

"It was a ring ceremony. The ring was a monstrous gold band borrowed of the village jeweler. People called the bride lovely, but she was so homely that hollyhocks wouldn't grow in the dooryard where she lived. The bridegroom was dressed in conventional black, so called because his father once wore the coat to a democratic convention. The presents were simply elegant. They came from people who couldn't afford to hire the washing done or buy baker's bread. Then after a 'sumptuous wedding supper' the bride and groom went to St. Louis on their wedding tour, where they spent more money in 24 hours than both of them can earn in a month."

OVERCOME BY THE DEBATE.

Mr. Clubman Tried a New Bluff on His Better Half, But It Wouldn't Go.

"Scuse me for being so late, m-m-my dear, but fact is we was having a dis-dis-chussion on whether the cons-tooshun follows th' flag," relates the Cleveland Plain Dealer, "or th' f-f-flag follows cons-t-or-shun."

"Oh, you were, were you? Well, what did you decide?"

"Thass it. What did we decide? Jim S-S-Smith says that flag don't f-f-follow anything. He says that f-flag always leads. Thass what Jim says. Joe Bangs says that cons'tooshun is mor'n hundred yearsh old and when it goes anywhere it ought t-to be t-t-taken in a hack. Jim says it couldn't by no possible means follow anysing. Good crack, wasn't it? Joe's got a g-g-great head."

"And what did you decide?"

"Who? Me? Mean me, my dear? Why, I jus' said that the best way to solve per-oblem was to wrap cons-tooshun tightly 'round flagstaff, an' then let 'em go into it togesser. Thass th' way. Watcher thing of it?"

"Well, I think if you don't pull off your shoes and follow them with the rest of your garments, and then wrap the blankets tightly around you, there'll be enough kinds of trouble raised in this family to wreck the best government that ever was formed."

Unreasonable Expectations.

A lady who was unfamiliar with the streets of New York was much confused by the jargon used by a car conductor. When she thought she must have arrived near her destination the conductor poked his head into the car and said: "Umpty bazazas!" "What street did you say?" demanded the passenger. "Ufty-umpth!" said the conductor. Much annoyed the lady from the suburbs went out on the platform and rebuked the conductor for his careless use of the vocal organs. He only glared at her and said: "What do you expect for $3 a week? A tenor solo?"—N. Y. Sun.

Nothing Ages a Woman So Quickly and Surely as Giving Way to Temper and Worry.

Never give way to fits of ill temper. Every sensible woman ought to be aware that bad temper and worry will trace more wrinkles in a week than hot and cold bathing and massage and complexion brushes and creams and lotions can remove in a year's faithful application.

Physicians assert that an immense amount of nerve-force is expended in every fit of bad temper; that when one little part of the nervous system is injuriously affected, the face first records it. The eyes begin to lose the luster of youth, muscles become flabby, the skin refuses to contract accordingly, and the inevitable result is wrinkles, woman's fiercest and most insidious foe.

Indulging in a fit of temper not only makes a woman old and ugly before her time, but it actually shortens life. Moreover, every time she loses control of her temper she unhinges a moral brain-cell and weakens by several degrees her capacity for self-control.

The oftener she permits herself to indulge in what she believes to be righteous indignation, the more frequently she finds such occasions presenting themselves, for life is full of such irritating opportunities.

It is these frequent bursts of passion that prevent women from growing old so beautifully that they seem to retain their youthful attractions, and, like a tree, become more amiable with age.

A mouth that from habit has set itself in an aggrieved or hard line soon settles in a grim curve that writes years of age upon a woman's face, and imparts a discontented and disagreeable expression which repels all desire for intimacy on the part of her acquaintances.

No matter how beautiful and brainy and fascinating the bad-tempered woman may be, or how lengthy her bank account, her power is infinitesimal compared with that of her amiable sister. And amiability is not only power; it is mental progression, health, happiness and long life to one's self and to one's friends and family.—N. Y. Weekly.

MRS. LILLIAN STEVENS.

She Has Just Been Reelected President of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens, who has been reelected president of the Women's Christian Temperance union, is a native of Dover, Me., and began her work as a teacher in her own state. At 21 she married Mr. Stevens and went with her husband to his home near Portland. Mrs. Stevens first met Miss Willard at Old Orchard in the summer of 1875 and there assisted in the organization of the Maine W. C. T. U. Her first office was that of treasurer of the state union. She next became president, and under her guidance the Maine organization soon became conspicuous in the national union and its president no less conspicuous among the ladies at work in the temperance cause. Mrs. Stevens' advance in the union was rapid. She was elected vice president during the life of Miss Willard and succeeded that great reformer as president when Miss Willard died.

Excellent Cleansing Fluid.

A cleaning fluid that will remove grease from the most delicate silks and cloths is made of one pint of distilled benzine, three-sixteenths of an ounce of fluid chloroform, one-eighth ounce of carbonate of ammonia and one-eighth ounce of sulphuric ether. It should be kept bottled and corked tightly and kept from fire and lights, as it is very inflammable.

Another Hold-Up.

"Poor Bronson."

"What's the matter with him?"

"He was the victim of a hold-up last night, so he tells me."

"You don't say so! How did it happen?"

"Oh, the baby had eaten something that didn't agree with it. He had to hold it up for three hours at a stretch."—Chicago Times-Herald.

"This snaillike pace," growled the first trolley car passenger, "is enough to rile a saint."

WOMEN AS FARMERS.

Some Who Have Taken Up Western Lands Have Made Quite a Success of Agriculture.

From time immemorial women have been tillers of the soil, but always as serving men. It has been reserved for the United States to produce the woman farmer in independent ownership, toiling of her own will and reaping herself the fruit of her labors.

One of the most picturesque instances of the woman farmer is furnished by Miss Gates, a trained nurse of New York city, who had gone to the west for her health shortly before the opening of the Cherokee strip in Oklahoma. She was living in Guthrie, Okla., and decided that she might as well become a landed proprietor. The homestead claims of 160 acres were to be assigned to those first "staking" or marking them after the hour designated for the "opening." Miss Yates took advantage of her vicinity to the strip to look it over in advance and select her claim. The opening day she crossed the line a minute after the hour (a minute before would have invalidated her rights), seated on a plow to which two heavy horses were attached, and "made the run," the first on the strip.

Her clever idea was to "stake the claim" by a plowed furrow, beginning on the outer edge. In this way she inclosed the land in incontestable fashion. She had a hired man with her, but she drove the plow. The next day a small cabin was built for the hired man. She lived in Guthrie until a tiny house could be built, then took personal possession. Five years of residence were required to perfect the claim, but at the end of two years the young woman was ready to return to the east, and transferred her rights to a settler, who paid enough for the claim to give the enterprising preemptor a clear profit of more than $1,000. She had seeded 60 acres to cotton and the remainder to corn and wheat, and was employing 50 negro hands when she transferred the claim.

Another nurse "timber claimed" a homestead which is done by planting trees in treeless soil. She set out 320 trees, built a log cabin and sent for her family in Sweden, consisting of mother, sister and brother. She has become almost the physician of the surrounding homesteads, and is making a good living.

On Long Island is a farm bought by several trained nurses of New York a few years ago. There were three in the enterprise at first, but Miss Mary L. Cromwell and Miss Clara Watkins bought out the third, who wished to relinquish her interest.

Their idea is to have a home to which they can retire when old and unable to continue in active professional life. They rent the farm on shares to an energetic man, and reserve two rooms in the house for their own occupancy when at liberty to leave the city. They expect to have the place free from mortgage within a few years.

In Georgia is a farm devoted to mistletoe and holly growing. It is owned by the Carteledge family, consisting of mother and two daughters, but the daughters do the "farming." Their negro farm hands would not plant a holly tree for worlds, as they believe that if they did they would die as soon as the tree became tall enough to cast a shadow the measure of their graves.

Last Christmas the sisters found the trees so grown that they required thinning out, and the trees that were removed were sent north for Christmas trees and brought high prices, as they were symmetrical and covered with large, rich berries. They plant the mistletoe berries under the bark of old oak trees, in the fork or hollow, where they can get a hold as they germinate.

Kansas has its successful women farmers, too. Helen and Edith Raymond are Chicago girls, whose parents died some years ago, leaving them a few thousand dollars. It was not enough to support them in the city, and they finally decided to buy a farm. They bought 80 acres in Jackson county, Kan., and devoted themselves to raising fruit. They also raise corn for their stock and wheat and vegetables for their own use.

Two other farmer sisters in Kansas are Martha and Carrie James, of Osage county. Their father died and they undertook to keep the farm going. They do all the work. Miss Carrie James was one of the pioneers who secured a claim in Oklahoma, which she leased and visits once a year to collect rent and to assure herself that it is being properly cared for.—N. Y. Tribune.

Obtrusive.

"Do you think it is proper to introduce money in a political campaign?" inquired the man of lofty ideals.

"It doesn't wait to be introduced," answered Senator Sorghum. "It just breaks in."—Washington Star.

A SUBSTANTIAL SILO.

Progressive Dairymen No Longer Consider It an Experiment But an Absolute Necessity.

I am constrained to believe that the advocates of the so-called cheap silos are making a mistake, this conclusion being drawn both from observation and personal experience. It may have been wise in the past to advise and to construct such silos, because many farmers considered it experimental, and I am willing to say now that a cheap construction is better than none at all, from the fact that few are bold enough to deny its necessity. We are warranted in advising the building of thoroughly airtight walls. Whether we have yet reached the ideal I am not sure. We have been slowly solving during the past ten years, and shall, no doubt, make further improvements. I think, however, that when we take into consideration both cost and value, the well-built stave silo the most satisfactory. The cut shows a section of a stave silo with staves six inches wide and 2½ inches thick. Pine, beveled to the circle, grooved and tongued, is put together with white lead, making each joint air tight, ends of staves being joined with a heavy piece of galvanized iron. The foundation is similar to any barn wall, only the wall projection is outside the silo, permitting an even, perpendicular wall on the inside. The top of the wall is so inclined that water cannot stand upon it. The inside of the wall and bottom of silo are cemented, the center being about six inches lower than the side; a basin-shaped bottom. The roof should be symmetrical, with wide cornice projections, and, if possible, so adjoining the barn as to give it a fine architectural appearance. Two coats of paint and a weather vane complete the external construction.

NEW IDEA FOR A SILO.

The cut shows some conveniences not always found. Some trouble has arisen in connection with solid iron rods, lacking flexibility; silo expansion and cold weather have caused them to break. The Page wire fence has been used to some extent, and has the advantage of overcoming to a degree this difficulty, but other objections seem to offset it, so that it has not come into general use. In casting about for a medium that would combine the good qualities of both the steel wire cable seemed to fill the bill. The strength of one-half-inch wire rope is given as one-third greater than five-eighths-inch solid iron, and at the same time possesses the flexibility so much needed. The system of fastening is the ordinary twin buckle; other means, however, may be equaly as good. The system of doors has always been a difficult one to solve. The continuous door is the only satisfactory one, yet the patent doors that I have seen are open to many objections not necessary to enumerate here. My idea was to get a door that should be continuous, hung on the outside, firmly held and always ready to use. This we secured by alternating the doors with two staves between them uncut. The heavy iron cleats formed to the circle serve also as hinges. They are bolted to a similar iron on the inside, countersunk in the door and staves. These doors are fastened with refrigerator-door fasteners, two on the lower doors and one on the doors nearer the top, holding the doors absolutely to their place. The dormer window in the roof furnishes sufficient light and a place to fill. We have, therefore, combined durability, effectiveness and convenience.—H. E. Cook, in Rural New Yorker.

Prizes for Road Menders.

In some English counties prizes are offered for the section of road which is kept in the best order throughout the year. There is an honorable rivalry among the roadmasters for obtaining these rewards, and the winners are proud of their distinction as champion road menders. When all the roads are preeminent for their excellence, it cannot be an easy matter for the most critical committee to make the awards, but the effect of the competition is to put every man on his mettle and to increase the efficiency of the road service. How different are these methods and processes from those which prevail in rural America, where highway commissioners draw their salaries and set gangs of laborers at work a few days before election or where farmers in the autumn, when there is nothing else to do, unite in a week's voluntary service as road menders.

PROF. BAKER'S IDEAS.

Noted Civil Engineer Explodes Some of the Fallacious Arguments of Good Roads Advocates.

The Technograph, published at the University of Illinois, has an article by Prof. I. O. Baker, a civil engineer, on "Fallacies of Good Road Economics," in which he alleges that "fallacious arguments" are sometimes used in behalf of good roads. It is often said, for example, that a horse in Europe does twice as much work as one in America and that bad roads therefore costs the American farmer the cost of feeding one-half of the horses plus the interest on their value. But the premise is a mere guess, and the argument assumes that all horses are on the road all the time, which is a great error. The farmer, moreover, needs more horses to raise his crops than to haul them to market.

It is often estimated that the saving per horse due to improved roads is from $15 to $25 per year. This sum, multiplied by the number of horses given in the last census report, is put down as the annual loss due to bad roads. There is no evidence of the actual loss. Possibly a horse could earn $25 more a year on a good road than on a bad one, though farmers assert that horses are damaged fully this much by being driven on stone roads. But in fact only a small percentage of the horses of the country are on the road all the time. It is not at all clear that with better roads farmers could keep fewer horses. The hauling of crops to market is an incident of the farmer's work, not his constant employment. As respects the conclusions of the United States road inquiry office, circular 19, the professor thinks they rest on very imperfect data. It is absurd to say, he thinks, that the average cost of hauling crops to the market is 25 cents per ton per mile and that the cost of marketing the crop is 26.6 per cent. of its value. The real advantages of good roads are that they are more comfortable and less expensive to use during parts of the year; facilitate rural mail delivery; enable children to attend school with less difficulty; add to the social opportunities of the farmer. "The fundamental defect in in the construction and maintenance of American highways," says Prof. Baker, "is the lack of intelligent and effective supervision."—Baltimore Sun.

HOW TO HANDLE POSTS.

Dressing and Setting Them in a Proper Manner Is a Task Requiring Some Care.

If to be driven two feet deep, dress two sides in a direct line from lower dotted line of a, 11 inches long, from shoulder to point, making a one-inch point. Then dress the edges from 12 to 18 inches. Edges may be rounded from shoulder to point. A post dressed more on one side than another, as at b and c, will drive crooked. Stake the fence line perfectly straight, using three-foot stakes. Then take a one-half-inch rope 100 or 200 feet long, stretch tight on line where posts are to be driven. Saw a block six inches long and drive it into pins one-half inch square. Drive a pin where each post is to set.

HOW TO DRIVE POSTS.

Get a mattock, the hoe blade of which is three or three and a half inches broad and nine inches long and the opposite side with an ax blade four inches broad and six inches long. Use the ax and make a mark even with the pins to indicate where posts are to be set. Use the ax again, sinking deep on either side of pin. Then with two or three vigorous digs with the hoe blade, dig out pin and all, thus leaving a hole 10 or 12 inches deep for setting a post, leaving the sides solid to hold posts from giving sideways, as there is no danger of them going edgewise, as the entire fence joins in support. Raise a post above a hole and settle down hard, which will cause it to sink still deeper. But eight or ten inches will then be left for the post to be driven. A few solid jolts from a 20-pound post maul will settle it securely.

To gauge the depth, use a straight stick four or six inches longer than the posts are to stand out of ground. Put a gauge mark at bottom and a plumb bob on a string to reach near the ground. Set this gauge three or four inches from post to be driven, lean stick to which the string is attached about six degrees and govern the fence post by the plumb. Then use a platform, box or stand in wagon, and driving the posts will be of but little labor.—A. Byers, in Farm and Home.

The Prairie Dog to Pass.

The prairie dog must go. The little fellow has clung to his home on the plains more tenaciously than any other of the inhabitants of our desert waste, but has at last reached the end of his tether. Agricultural Secretary Wilson has decided that prairie dogs kill the grass and ruin good grazing land, and must therefore give way to agricultural civilization. Chemists have discovered a mixture which will make whole villages of prairie dogs fight for the first bite, but which is sure to bring disaster in the end. It is believed that the dog can be destroyed in the course of a few years, and that with his disappearance western agriculture will be rid of a most insidious foe.—National Stockman.

BRITAIN LOSING TRADE.

Manufacturers Warned to Beware of Industrial Competition.

To the disappointments of war time, which are keenly felt when the Chirstmas season is approaching and over 210,000 soldiers are fighting across seas, is added the increasing pressure of taxation and industrial competition. The trade journals of England are making a great ado over the success of American manufacturers in underbidding their British rivals in tenders for the Urganda railway bridges.

This industrial incident has created a strong impression, since it indicates that the expansion of the British empire and the opening of new markets tend to promote American industries.

British iron and steel manufacturers are warned by their own trade journals that they must arouse themselves without delay, unless they are prepared to lose their foreign markets, since it has become notorious that Americans and Germans are making their competition felt with cumulative effect.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 28, 1901.

President McKinley is too wise a statesman to cross the extra session bridge before he gets to it. He has called the attention of Congress to the legislation he considers necessary. Naturally, he would prefer avoiding an extra session, but he would not allow his preference to cause him to shirk his duty. Whether there will be an extra session depends upon Congress, not upon the President.

Senators and Representatives who have called at the White House in the interests of constituents who seek commissions in the army, under the Re-organization Act, have been very plainly informed by the President that so far as it is possible to do so, these appointments will be given to officers and men who have served with the volunteers in the Philippines. This position is such a just one that nobody has uttered one word of protest against it.

The amended Revenue Reduction bill, which will be taken up by the Senate this week, makes about the same reduction in the revenues—$40,000,000—that the House bill did, but the items differ widely. The Senate bill reduces the tax on beer to $1.50, which the House refused by a vote to do.

Rapid progress is being made in both House and Senate in disposing of the regular appropriation bills, and it is not probable that any of them will fail, whatever other legislation may be left unacted upon at the close of the session.

The lawyer who wins the most cases naturally gets the most clients. C. A. Snow and Co., the Washington Patent Lawyers, get more allowances of patents than any other firm practicing before the U. S. Patent office—last year they got 1497, many of which had been previously rejected.

Senator Depew has received many congratulations on his speech in favor of the Ship Subsidy bill. Having been a railroad man all his life, he is thoroughly familiar with the transportation of freight both on land and sea. He cited numerous excellent reasons why the Subsidy bill should become a law, not the least of which was contained in these words of his: "It is estimated that there is paid by American producers to foreign ship owners in freight charges, at least $175,000,000, a year. Four per cent. on this would give us an American Merchant Marine, and the expenditure of much the larger part of this money in our own country."

Before giving up his seat to Senator Clapp, elected by the Republican Legislature of Minnesota to succeed the late Senator Davis, Senator Towne, the Demo-Pop, who held the seat a few weeks by gubernatorial appointment, made a political speech, in which all the isms condemned by the majority of the voters in the late campaign were exploited. A resolution for the independence of the Philippines was made the text for this wail of woe.

President McKinley's message to Congress, transmitting a report of Secretary Root, and a report of the Philippine Commission, on existing conditions and needs in the islands, is receiving much attention. It concludes with these words: "I earnestly recommend legislation under which the government of the islands may have authority to assist in their peaceful industrial development in the direction indicated by the Secretary of War." The Philippine Commission strongly urges the passage of the Spooner Philippine bill by Congress, saying of it: "Until its passage, no purely central civil government can be established; no public franchise of any kind granted, and no substantial investment of private capital in internal improvements is possible." Of the need of civil laws in the islands, the report says: "The Army has brought the Philippines to the point where they offer a ready and attractive field for investment and enterprise, but to make this possible, there must be mining laws, homestead and land laws, general transportation laws, banking, and currency laws." Of the general condition the report says, after noting the favorable effect of the re-election of President McKinley: "From now on conditions in these islands will grow steadily better, and however formidable the difficulties really are, the possibilities that present themselves of improving the condition of the people in education, wealth, comfort and in the knowledge of how to govern themselves, cannot but awaken the deepest enthusiasm on the part of every friend of civilization, familiar with the actual conditions." Many believe that President McKinley will call an extra session if this Congress fails to act upon his recommendation, as lack of time may compel it to do. Senator Lodge, Chairman of the Philippine Committee, expresses confidence that the Philippine legislation recommended by the President, can be pushed through the Senate in a few days, but that confidence is not generally shared by Senators. His committee is now considering the best method of accomplishing the desired end.

THE FINAL RITES.

England's Queen Interred in Frogmore Mausoleum.

King Follows the Coffin—Solemn Procession to the Last Resting Place—Ceremony at the Mausoleum Was Private—Appropriate Music by the Surpliced Choir.

WINDSOR, Feb. 4.—The final rites over the dead Queen were concluded at 3:30 p. m., and the body was laid to rest in the Frogmore Mausoleum.

King Edward, Queen Alexandra, Emperor William and others of the royal family attended the services beside the coffin at an early hour this morning.

Hundreds of people poured into Windsor throughout the morning, and by 1 o'clock the long walk was already black with spectators, mostly from the surrounding country, waiting for a last glance at the coffin containing the remains of Queen Victoria. The sun was shining brightly.

The final obsequies promised to be as stately as the initial stages.

The representatives of royal families arrived from London at about 1 o'clock and drove to Windsor Castle.

The streets of the old town were still hung with wreathes, sadly faded since Saturday. The stores were closed during the interment.

Dismounted Life Guardsmen in their scarlet cloaks, the white plumes of their helmets glistening in the sun, kept the route clear from the castle slope. Amid the bare boughs of the trees below the mist arose from the damp earth, trampled into mud by the uneasy few thousands. The air was sharp and cold.

From the Albert Memorial Chapel to the mausoleum, nearly a mile from the great gate of the castle, there is a steep slope of 500 yards, at the bottom of which is the lodge gate and a fence. On the castle side of this were hundreds of ticket holders. On the other side, where the long walk commences, the public was massed.

At 2:45 p. m. a picturesque touch of color was added to the scene Sir Walter Parratt, private organist to the late Queen, and organist of St. George's Chapel Royal, Windsor, and his choir, all in surplices and college caps, walked quickly down the slope, through crowds, to the mausoleum. Then the minute guns commenced to boom, as a battery of artillery at the foot of the long walk paid its final honors to the dead Queen. The Windsor church bells tolled solemnly and the strains of the band, gradually growing stronger and stronger, echoed from the castle quadrangle.

At 3:15 p. m. the head of the procession passed slowly out of King George's arch in the following order:

The queen company of Grenadier Guards, with arms reversed.

The governor and constable of Windsor Castle, the Duke of Argyl.

Highlanders and pipers.

Royal servants.

Band of Grenadier Guards.

The bishop of Winchester and the dean of Windsor.

The lord chamberlain and the lord steward.

The gun carriage, with the coffin, supported by the late Queen's equerries and household, flanked by the same officers as appeared in Saturday's ceremony in London.

Following the coffin walked King Edward, the Duke of Connaught, Emperor William, the King of the Belgians, Prince Henry of Prussia and all the other royal personages, including Queen Alexandra, the princesses, with the exception of the few who had already left England. Those present were accompanied by their suites.

The route was through the Norman gateway, across the quadrangle, through the George IV archway, down the long walk, through the lodge gates, and then from the long walk to the mausoleum.

The route from the George IV archway to the gates of the mausoleum was lined with troops under command of Col. Napier Miles of the 1st Life Guards.

The queen's pipers played from the gates of the mausoleum itself. On arriving there the queen's company of Grenadiers opened outward and formed in double rank on the steps of the mausoleum.

The choir met the funeral cortege on the steps. The Highlanders, pipers and servants, on their arrival, went into the mausoleum and took up the positions allotted to them.

Then the coffin was carried into the mausoleum, preceded by the choir and clergy.

The members of the royal family took their places on each side of the sarcophagus, the royal household standing in the transcept on each side. The rest of the ceremony was private, as the space inside the mausoleum was limited.

The choir sang Sir Arthur Sullivan's anthem, "Yea, Though I Walk;" the hymn, "Sleep Thy Last Sleep," and Tennison's "The Face of Death Is Turned Toward the Sun of Light," set to music by Sir Walter Parratt.

Pneumonia Can be Prevented.

This disease always results from a cold or an attack of the grip and may be prevented by the timely use of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. That remedy was extensively used during the epidemics of La Grippe of the past few years, and not a single case has ever been reported that did not recover or that resulted in pneumonia, which shows it to be a certain preventive of that dangerous disease. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy has gained a world wide reputation for its cures of colds and grip. For sale by all druggists.

La Grippe Quickly Cured.

"In the winter of 1898 and 1899 I was taken down with a severe attack of what is called La Grippe," says F. L. Hewett, a prominent druggist of Winfield, Ill. "The only medicine I used was two bottles of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. It broke up the cold and stopped the coughing like magic, and I have never since been troubled with Grippe." Chamberlain's Cough Remedy can always be depended upon to break up a severe cold and ward off any threatened attack of pneumonia. It is pleasant to take, too, which makes it the most desirable and one of the most popular preparations in use for these ailments. For sale by all druggists.

THE MOUNTAIN CHAUTAUQUA.

The Program at Mountain Lake Park for the Coming Summer.

The first year of the New Century will be duly celebrated at Mountain Lake Park by the presentation of the strongest and most brilliant Chautauqua program which has ever been offered at this justly famed resort. This may seem like an idle boast to the thousands who have enjoyed the rare offerings which have been given annually for the last half dozen years, including the best things which could be procured in the lecture and entertainment field—but this is the year to show what a 20th Century Chautauqua should be, and it will be signalized at Mountain Lake Park by the gathering together of a galaxy of the strongest and best things in the entertainment line—regardless of expense. The Mountain Chautuqua now enjoys a reputation second to none, and new laurels will be added this year. Those who seek a summer resort par-excellence — where every comfort and convenience can be secured at modest cost, and where opportunities are at hand for rich intellectual enjoyment and uplift when time hangs heavy, can have their fondest dreams realized at this paradise of the mountains. Let a little glimpse of the remarkable program attractions already secured satisfy you that the feast will be a regal one. Among lecturers we name Senator Johnathan P. Dolliver, the brilliant statesman and orator; Dr. T. DeWitt Talmage, the best-known preacher of the age, and the highest priced lecturer in America; Dr. P. S. Henson, the wittiest and most brilliant lecturer among the Baptists; Father Kelley, a broad-minded and eloquent priest of the Roman Catholic church, whom we are glad to have on our undenominational platform; Dr. Morgan Wood, the Congregationalist, who has crowded his churches to suffocation in the great cities of Detroit, Cleveland, and Toronto, Canada; Jahu DeWitt Miller, the reigning Chautauqua favorite, who returns with new lecture and question drawer; Major J. Pond, the Lyceum manager, who has conducted tours for all the great celebrities, will tell of his personal experiences; Hon. Lou Beauchamp, almost without a rival in his ability to amuse and please; Dr. J. W. Hancher, a brave and fearless talker on important themes; F. F. Hilder, of the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, who has made three journeys to the Philippines, will tell of these people and resources, and will show original pictures. Dr. E. L. Eaton in Science talks, and great telescope for studying the heavens; Leon H. Vincent and Homer B. Sprague will furnish delightful courses of literary studies. Dr. Frederick H. Parkhurst, Dr. Homer J. Smith, and Dr. Franklin McElfresh will also contribute bright lectures on great themes. Not quite content with what this country affords, Dr. Davidson is arranging to import for the summer, a bright, young Englishman, who is creating a great furore in his own country, to deliver a series of biographical lectures, with notes on current events. The Chinese Minister, Wu, has also been invited. This is of course but an imperfect list, as the summer is still far away, and engagements are being consummated daily. Yet it gives some adequate idea of what may be expected in line of lectures. The music will surpass any former program. The Royal Hungarian Gypsy Orchestra, augmented in number—the very best thing of the kind obtainable, will be present for the entire month of August.

The Schumann Lady Quartette and the Mendelsshon Male Quartette, two exceptional companies of singers, will appear one week each. The Imperial Hand Bell Ringers, with 110 bells—will give several delightful concerts. The Boston Carnival and Concert Company, illustrated and illuminated, will be one of the events of the season. Miss Ainsworth, with this company, is the best contralto singer in New England. There are illustrated songs, readings, the pantomime of the seasons; and the Carnival of Light, with wonderful calcium light effects in colors, is one of the most bewilderingly beautiful spectacles known to the platform. Garvin Spencer and Miss Florence MacDonald in costume, will sing Scotch melodies. Eugene W. Page, unquestionably the most expert mandolinist in the world, will astonish by his playing, and with his assistant will furnish music on many instruments. Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Whyte will give lecture recitals on the great musical composers. Miss Marie Carter, Soprano, and Mr. C. Delmore Cheeny, basso, are two superior soloists already secured. James S. Burdette, the humorist; Miss Marion Short, the "queen of readers;" Rosani, the famous juggler; Karl Germain and sister, in Marvelous Magic and feats of Telepathy, will furnish enjoyment for many hours. Of course we shall have an entirely new lot of wonderful moving pictures with some surpassing colored effects only possible with the unrivaled Vitagraph, which we shall use. These will be shown a number of evenings.

There will be a number of brilliant illustrated lectures by George Wharton James on the Great West, our best present author on this region, also the Burton-Holmes lectures, all the views in color, by Mr. Francis Brown treating of the Paris Exposition. The Edge of China, and the Passion Play of 1900 at Oberammergau. Animated pictures accompany these remarkable lectures, which are the most perfect in every way ever seen at Mountain Lake Park. Millard Gaston and G. Paul Smith will delight all with their impersonations in costume, and their unique specialities, sand pictures and clay modeling—Venetian night on the lake will have many added features of great brilliancy to please the thousands who are certain to be present.

If this were all, is it not enough to satisfy even the most exacting? Much yet, however, will be added. It takes an immense number of people, with varying talents, to acceptably fill twenty-eight days. They will, however, be found and the issue of the Mountain Chautauqua for April will give you full and complete details. Nothing more worthy in the shape of a program will be offered anywhere on the continent, of this you may rest assured, and no more beautiful and attractive building in which to offer it, than we now have in our new auditorium, has yet been erected. Prepare now to come, see, hear and enjoy, and your summer outing will be a joy without alloy.

They Have a Romantic Experience in Getting Married.

A young Fairmont swell met a very pretty young lady of Salem Thursday at the Fairmont depot and came with her to Oakland and put up at a leading hotel. The young man had quite a little roll on him and got the landlord of the hotel to make arrangements for a wedding. The clerk of the court and the ministers were seen and before the wedding the young man took his lady out in grand trousseau, and returned to the hotel, where they were married, but when the hotel bill was to be settled, it was discovered that the young man had spent all his money on the wedding garments for his bride. There were some hard words on the part of the landlord and some tears shed by the bride. It was finally arranged by the young man's taking the landlord's card and promising to remit the amount. They returned to Fairmont, where they were seen to leave the train as happy as if there had been no jar.

OAKLAND CLUB MEETING.

Report of the Visitors' Committee. New Members Admitted. Large Attendance.

Tuesday night the regular monthly meeting of the Oakland Club was held, presided over by President Percy Procter, who came here from Cincinnati for the purpose. Quite a large attendance, taking into account the disagreeable weather prevailing, was present.

Following the reading of the report of the Visitors' Committee, which is given in full below, a lively discussion was participated in by various members of the Club in which many suggestions looking to the future welfare and prosperity of the town were brought out.

Prior to the regular meeting the Executive Committee admitted to membership in the Club Messrs. Norman S. Heindel, Chas. F. White, Chas. Liller, W. R. Stull and Frank Laughlin, and elected Dr. Henry W. McComas to fill a vacancy occurring in the committee.

The report of the Visitors' Committee was read by its chairman, Mr. James C. Peddicord, as follows:

OAKLAND, MD., Feb. 5th, 1891.

To the Oakland Club,

GENTLEMEN:—In accordance with the by-laws, the undersigned Committee on Visitors herewith submits its report, with such recommendations and suggestions as cover the duties required of them. Your Committee in the spring of 1900 had Oakland as a summer resort advertised in the Baltimore, Washington, D. C., Cincinnati and Pittsburg papers, and in addition to said advertisements issued an illustrated booklet, entitled "Guide to Oakland," and distributed said booklet very extensively. This work on the part of the Committee bore excellent fruit, and was the means of bringing about one hundred summer visitors to Oakland. This is not a mere guess, but the fact is established by letters now on file among the papers of the Club. Your Committee recommends, therefore, that an advertisement be inserted in said newspapers the coming season, and also recommends the distribution of the booklet published last spring, as the Club has on hand a sufficient number for that purpose. All the advertising which the Club can do will not bring people to our town and keep them here during the summer season, unless the people of the town do everything in their power to make the town attractive, and visitors comfortable. We suggest, therefore, that the Club again offer prizes for the best kept yards, lawns, etc., through the Committee on Improvements.

We think that, in addition to the advertisements and distribution of booklets for the purpose of reaching the general public, there should be an effort made to reach certain individuals who already know something of our town and the inducements it offers summer visitors. To this end, we recommend that the Secretary of the Club procure from the several hotel registers or otherwise, as far as possible, a list of the guests who spent the summer in Oakland during the last year or two, and that he mail a copy of the booklet, or "Guide to Oakland," to each of them. By this means we will keep constantly before them the advantages of Oakland as a place to spend the summer.

We have one other suggestion to make which we deem very important, and that is that the Club have small slips the size of an envelope printed giving the advantages of Oakland as a summer resort, which slips, when so printed, shall be furnished to our business and professional men, with the request that they enclose one of said slips in their letters to all city correspondents and such other persons as they think may be of an advantage to Oakland.

With regard to maintaining a bureau of information, we have this to say: That since the organization of the Club all persons have been requested by advertisements published and the booklets distributed to apply to the Secretary for any and all information which might be desired. The Secretary, therefore, has heretofore practically and successfully filled the demand for a bureau of information. We do not think any better plan can be devised, and would suggest that the course heretofore adopted be continued.

We cannot close this report without saying, in our opinion, the efforts of this Club to promote the interests of our town have been eminently successful, and we believe, with the experience of the past year, much greater and better results will be attained in the future.

Respectfully submitted.

JAMES C. PEDDICORD,
Chairman.

The report was unanimously adopted and a motion prevailed to instruct the committee to carry into effect the recommendations made therein.

There is a growing sentiment in the Club's membership to bring the town to the fore and in every way make it more attractive for the summer visitors as well as the residents.

Col. Sturgiss, chairman on the Committee on Improvements, was instructed to inspect the platforms and streets of the town and call the attention of the authorities to all defects found.

A vote of thanks was tendered Mr. W. McCulloh Brown for a map of the county which was furnished a few weeks ago.

GROUND HOG SAW HIS SHADOW.

Then He Scurried Back for Six Weeks' Sleep.

The ground hog came out of his burrow on Saturday, saw his shadow and scurried back into his hole to sleep six weeks longer, while poor humanity will shiver in blasts of winter.

He is supposed to indicate by his movements on February 2nd whether the winter is over or whether there will be more cold weather. The sunshine, which would induce some animals to linger awhile to bask in its rays held out no inducement to Mr. Ground Hog, but on the contrary frightened him terribly and he fled for his hole, pursued by his shadow. His term of hibernation for the second period will end six weeks from Saturday, at which time his charm upon the weather man is supposed to come to an end and spring-like, balmy weather returns with him.

Some folks do not altogether believe in the ground hog and his forecasts, but they have nothing better to offer in his stead, for weather observers are not allowed the same degree of unrestrained liberty in forecasting as the ground hogs are.

The weather of Sunday and Monday indicated that "the ground hog was getting in his work," as a gentleman remarked, for both days were as rough as they well could be, rain, snow and sleet making up the quota of weather for the two days mentioned.

A Night of Terror.

"Awful anxiety was felt for the widow of the brave General Burnham of Machias, Me., when the doctors said she would die from Pneumonia before morning," writes Mrs. S. H. Lincoln, who attended her that fearful night, but she begged for Dr. King's New Discovery, which had more then once saved her life, and cured her of Consumption. After taking she slept all night. Further use entirely cured her. This marvellous medicine is guaranteed to cure all Throat, Chest and Lung Diseases. Only 50c and $1.00. Trial bottles free at all druggists.

Died.

STANTON.—At his parents' home, Grantsville, on January 31, 1901, Clarence Maurice, son of C. A. and Laura Stanton, aged 4 months and 19 days. Funeral services in Reformed church, Grantsville, Feb. 2, and burial in Grantsville cemetery, Rev. E. S. Hassler, pastor, officiating.

WOLF.—At the home of his son near Sunnyside, this county, on Jan. 24th, 1901, of general debility, Isaac Wolf, aged 78 years. His funeral took place on the 26th, the interment being made in the family burying ground. Rev. Fike officiated. The deceased was a native of West Virginia and a member for a long number of years of the German Baptist church. One son and four daughters survive him.

BAUER.—Mr. John G. Bauer, ex-sheriff of Allegany county, died at the residence of his daughter, Mrs. Joseph E. Harned, in Oakland, with whom he made his home for several years, on Sunday night last about nine o'clock, of paralysis, aged 70 years. Mr. Bauer was a native of Sindelsheim, Adelsheim, Baden. He was a member of the Cumberland City Council right after the war and was sheriff in 1875. He was a member of the German Lutheran church of Cumberland. His remains were taken to Cumberland Monday afternoon on train No. 46, accompanied by Mrs. Harned and a son of the deceased, who resides in Cumberland. The funeral took place Wednesday and was attended by quite a crowd of friends and relatives.

BOWERS.—At her residence south Oakland on Monday morning at 2.30 o'clock after a week's illness of malignant typhoid fever, Mrs. John T. Bowers, aged about 49 years. The deceased was the mother of thirteen children, all of whom are living at home with the exception of the two, who are married. The funeral took place Tuesday morning after services at the home, conducted by Rev. A. Mick, pastor of St. Paul's M. E. church, the interment being made at the Lower burying ground. Mrs. Bowers was a most estimable lady, a true Christian, a kind and loving mother and a devoted wife. Her place at the fireside of the now desolate home can never be filled with that wealth of love bestowed upon the sorrowing husband and children. Her death is made doubly sad owing to the serious illness of members of her family for the past two months, two children at this time being ill. Expressions of sorrow for the bereaved household are heard upon every hand.

THE CUBAN CENSUS.

Taken Under the Supervision of the War Department.

Gen. Sanger's Work Furnishes Food for Thought—People of the Island Not Fit for Absolute Independence.

[Special Correspondence.]

THAT American occupation has benefited Cuba is cheerfully admitted by even those islanders who clamored for absolute independence as soon as the treaty of peace between Spain and the United States had been signed. With the exception of a coterie of rabid revolutionists all the leaders of Cuban politics have learned to appreciate the sincerity of America's friendship and the people at large want nothing more than an autonomous government under the protection of the United States.

Under the able administration of Gen. J. P. Sanger, U. S. A., acting for the war department, a census of the islands has just been completed, in accordance with a proclamation issued by President McKinley in August, 1899. The actual work of enumeration was begun two months later, and within the incredibly short time of one year the entire work was completed. When first issued the presidential proclamation struck terror to the hearts of many good Cuban patriots who feared that the taking of the census might be the first step toward annexation, especially as it was proposed that the work should be done under the supervision of the military governor of the island, assisted by officers and enlisted men of the Uinted States army.

Gen. Sanger notified the secretary of war of the steadily growing dissatisfaction of the natives and at the eleventh hour it was decided that the offices of supervisors and enumerators should be filled by Cubans, and that the field work should be performed by them, under the supervision of an experienced officer of the United States census, so that when the enumeration should be completed it would be a census of Cubans by Cubans. Gen. Sanger was placed at the head of the census bureau, with Victor H. Olmstead, an experienced official of the United States census, as chief of staff. Six Cuban supervisors, appointed by the military governor, completed the executive board. That these officials performed their duties honorably and faithfully is evidenced not only by the completeness of their reports, but also by the fact that of the appropriation granted for the taking of the census a balance of $33,000 remained unexpended at the close of the work.

GEN. J. P. SANGER.

The great majority of Cuba's population is of Spanish and African descent, and the social conditions in the country districts bear a close resemblance to feudalism. The colored and half-breed elements are held in economical bondage by the landowners and planters, and nothing was done under Spanish rule to elevate or educate them. The leaders of Spanish thought have from time immemorial believed in keeping the masses in ignorance, believing it the best way to perpetuate the rule of a greedy and overbearing aristocracy. Before the outbreak of the last insurrection, which led to our war with Spain, there were nearly 100,000 plantations, farms, orchards and cattle ranges on the island, valued at $200,000,000. In the course of the war thousands of plantation houses and farm buildings were destroyed by Spaniards and revolutionists, and entire districts, once prosperous and peopled by happy peasants, were reduced to abject poverty. From this condition the people have not yet recovered, although under the administration of United States army officers great progress has been made in the matter of reestablishing plantations and securing work for the half-starved laboring men in rural districts.

Under Spanish rule Cuba had no manufacturing enterprises, excepting some cigar factories in Havana and sugar mills, producing raw sugar, molasses and rum, in the country. Since the Americans have secured control of the government various corporations who have attempted to develop the mineral resources of the island have met with some measure of success. In whatever Americans undertake, however, they are hampered by the prejudices of the uneducated Cubans who persist in looking upon them as invaders instead of benefactors.

Gen. Sanger's report, although noncommittal and scrupulously fair, is calculated to strengthen the belief that the Cubans should not be granted absolute independence. The great mass of the people is unfit to exercise the right of franchise, and even the better educated classes do not seem to have an adequate conception of the responsibilities of an independent government. Under our treaty with Spain we are more or less responsible to the civilized world for the future of Cuba, and as yet there are no evidences that life and property would be safe under a native administration. Nations, like individuals, should be just before they are generous; and therefore the United States must always exercise paramount power over Cuba, even should it be granted autonomy.

Of the 1,700,000 Cubans hardly more than 25 per cent. are qualified for citizenship, and this minority is divided into so many factions that the withdrawal of American troops would be followed almost immediately by international complications and domestic violence, quite as bitter as those which characterized the uprising against Spain.

Naturally, the Cubans are an intelligent people. Education will make them an enterprising one, too. But not until the American schoolmaster has completed his missionary work should they be invested with independent power.

The leaders of progressive thought in Havana, and the merchants in other trade centers of the island, are in complete accord with this sentiment. They realize, perhaps more than we do, that the prosperity and future greatness of Cuba depend on the commercial and industrial development of the country and the education of its ignorant negro and mixed population, and they know that under a native partisan administration peace could not be maintained for any length of time.

NATIVE AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS IN CUBA.

To many of us who had serious doubts as to the wisdom of intrusting Cuba's affairs to a military administration it comes as a pleasant surprise that not only are the Cubans entirely satisfied with what has been accomplished under that regime thus far, but that many regret that the local government affairs have been transferred to boards and councils composed entirely of natives. They fear that municipal and district expenditures will not be scrutinized as closely as heretofore, and that corruption will enter into the letting of contracts and the granting of concessions and franchises. No grander tribute could be paid to our army officers, nor one of which our country could be prouder.

The introduction of American farm machinery is one of the best things that has happened to Cuba. Hitherto agricultural labor has been performed without the aid of labor-saving implements, and the crops have been correspondingly lean and costly. The small farmers still cling to their patriarchal ways, but the large landowners are enthusiastic over the new order of things, and have not hesitated to go into debt for tools which will pay for themselves in a few seasons. Inasmuch as agriculture must, for at least 20 years to come, be the chief industry of the island, the progressiveness of the planters is extremely gratifying.

But without doubt the greatest work accomplished by the American military government in Cuba is the introduction of modern sanitary methods and regulations. For centuries Havana, Santiago and other island ports have been the breeding grounds of the various yellow fever epidemics which have found their way to New Orleans, Mobile, Savannah, Tampa and other American cities. The filth of ages, which had accumulated under Spanish rule, was removed; up-to-date systems of drainage were utilized to purify the water supply, and people were compelled to keep their houses and dooryards clean. The result of this concerted crusade against uncleanliness is most eloquently condensed in the simple statement that never since its foundation has the city of Santiago been exempt from yellow fever until this year.

Whatever may be the ultimate destiny of Cuba, certain it is that her people owe a debt of gratitude to the United States, aside from freeing them from Spanish misrule, which years of devotion scarcely can repay.

THE HOUSEHOLD

NICE WORK FOR WOMEN.

New York Girl Has Worked Out a Fine Little Business for Herself as Visiting Jeweler.

"My little leather bag contains all the materials and implements necessary to clean and repair jewelry," Miss Sara Morton explained. "I go from house to house in New York and have all the work that I can do.

"You have no idea how many sensible women there are who will not allow their favorite pieces of jewelry to be repaired by the best houses simply because they fear that some of their best stones will be changed. I have many customers who watch me closely the entire time that I am at work on their property. It was the discoverey of this peculiarity in a friend of mine that gave me the idea of my work. Before actually beginning my work I entered a good establishment as an apprentice, where I learned not only how to clean and repair jewelry, but also old watches, of which I make a specialty.

"I had absolutely no trouble in getting work. My method is very simple. I call, ask for the lady of the house, explain my business and as a rule get some work. By this method I soon had as many regular customers as I could manage, and now I have many calls that I am obliged to refuse simply for lack of time. Nearly every woman of liberal means has a good supply of jewelry, and few of them keep it in such condition that it does not need repairing and cleaning at least every six months. Few of them are willing to trust the cleaning of their finer pieces to their maids and as it is more convenient for them to let me come in to clean it than it is for them to collect it and send it to the jeweler, I get the work. These are my regular customers. Those who fear to allow their treasure into the hands of anyone where they cannot watch them belong to another class. As a rule, the articles they prize so highly are of little value to anyone besides themselves.

"My charges are less than those of a regular jeweler, and I am particular to have my work as good. I average five dollars a day above the cost of all materials used and my transportation expenses. That I consider good earning for a woman doing, as you might say, mechanical work in New York city. No, I never take work home. My evenings are all free, and so are my Sundays. I need rest, particularly my eyes. I often buy articles of my patrons and also act as agent in bringing purchasers to those who would like to sell. Many women admire only the latest fashions in jewelry just as they do in gowns. When an article is no longer what they consider stylish they become very anxious to get rid of it in order to use the money to get something more to their taste. Knowing that I keep in touch with the taste and desires of my patrons they appeal to me to act as agent. The majority of these women keep the jeweler's boxes in which they buy the articles, and when they are cleaned and snugly wrapped in their colored cottons it is hard to distinguish them from new. I have sold many such as wedding presents and

VISITING JEWELER AT WORK.

I cannot see the slightest objection to their being used in this way. They are always just as represented and cost about half as much as they would if bought new from the jeweler. Of course, I have many bargains, for as a rule such ultra stylish women are exceedingly extravagant. As they wear only the latest designs and the most fashionable stones they are often glad to let things go for a much smaller sum than they originally cost.

"My work is pleasant, I might almost say dainty. There is nothing heavy or laborious, so I cannot see why other women should hesitate to undertake it. I am the only one in the field so far as I can learn, but I am sure that there is room even here in New York for many more."—Lafayette McLaws, in Chicago Record.

HOLIDAY FANCY WORK.

How to Make a Tobacco Pouch That Will Delight the Heart of the Average Man.

A handsome tobacco pouch may be made from the illustrations, which represent the two patterns used, each side being duplicated.

Four such pieces are cut out of crimson or scarlet cloth and worked in applique. In the first one the chain stitch border (not the outer edge) is worked with green silk. The knot from which the different articles are made is done with black silk; the cigar case is of yellow cloth; the cigars worked in satin-stitch with brown silk. The case has two bands of chain-stitch in blue silk, and is edged all around with buttonhole stitch in the same color. The pipes are of white cloth shaded with long stitches of gray silk, and edged with yellow. The upper part of the pouch is of blue cloth, with a white silk edging and yellow dots; the under part of brown cloth, with black edging and a pattern worked in chain-stitch with white; the three tassels are embroidered with black and yellow silk.

In the second pattern the outer border is yellow, the knots black; the small pattern at the top is of blue cloth edged with yellow; the pipes of white cloth edged with blue and shaded with gray. The bundle of cigars is of brown cloth, shaded with black stitches, and fastened on with double rows of chain stitch in yellow silk. The cigar case is of light green cloth, edged with white; the Grecian pattern and dots are embroidered over it with white silk also.

To make the pouch up, join the four pieces together by seams—which are concealed by gold braid; cut out also and join four similar pieces of white kid for the lining; fasten this to the outside at the top only. Sew small brass rings round the top, and run a double piece of crimson silk cord through them. Put silk tassels of various colors at the bottom of the pouch and each of its four corners.—Boston Globe.

THOROUGHLY TESTED.

Simple Method of Cleaning a Woolen Dress That No One Need Hesitate to Try.

The following simple method of cleaning a dress skirt has been so thoroughly tested that no one need hesitate about trying it. The rule was first learned from a cook who accidentally had a cup of melted butter spilled over her dress. It was thought to be beyond reclaiming, but the cook herself declared that she could take every bit of the grease out—and she did. Since then the rule has been applied to many less hopeless cases, and invariably with the most satisfactory of results.

Take three-fourths of a pail of cold soft water and add one teacupful of ammonia. Thoroughly brush and shake the dress skirt, then rinse it up and down repeatedly in this ammonia water. After thoroughly "sousing" it, let it lie in the water for an hour. Once more rinse it up and down, then take it out, squeezing the water from it, but not wringing it.

Put up two lines so that they shall cross each other and hang the skirt upon them, pinning the bottom to the corssed lines so that the skirt shall be well spread apart.

While the skirt is still quite damp iron it upon the wrong side, ironing till dry."—Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

The Sofa Pillow Craze.

The sofa pillow fad has again taken possession of ladies who are making Christmas gifts. Any number of lovely pieces of work are produced by tracing on silk or linen. All-over designs turn out beautifully sometimes and make covers for superb cushions. Coarse orange linen squares for sale in the embroidery departments are converted into lovely covers by tracing the lines with some gold thread and using odds and ends of bright colored filoselle for filling in the rest of the pattern.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

A DOCTOR'S STORY.

Pulls Back the Curtain of Secrecy and Reveals Awful Work of Rum in a Respectable Home.

"You know nothing about intemperance," said a noted physician. "I could write volumes that would amaze you."

"Write one," I said.

"It would be a breach of honor. A physician, like a Romish priest, may not betray the confessional." After a moment he added: "Our profession takes us into homes. And lives and hearts that seem all bright and happy are often dark and miserable from sickness of the soul."

"There must be some scenes that it would be proper for you to tell me," I urged; "please think of some."

"I was called to the wife of a distinguished gentleman. Her husband sat by her bed fanning her, and a lovely bouquet of flowers was on the stand by her side. Two little girls were playing quietly in the room. It was a charming picture of love and devotion.

"'My wife fell downstairs,' said her husband, 'and I fear has hurt herself seriously.'

"I examined her shoulder. It was swollen and black, and one rib was broken.

"'How do you find her?' asked her husband, anxiously.

"'I will ask the questions, if you please. How did you so injure yourself?'

"'I fell on the stairway.'

"I hesitated. I was not in a paddy shanty, but in the home of a well-known and unstained man. I re-examined her side.

"SHE BEGGED ME NOT TO TELL YOU THE TRUTH."

"'When did she fall?' I asked.

"'Last night,' he said, after a second's pause, and a glance at her.

"My resolve was taken.

"'Please show me the place on the stairs where she struck,' I said to the husband, rising and going out. He followed me.

"'I was not with her when she fell,' he said.

"'The injury was not from a fall, and it was not done last night. Never try to deceive a doctor.'

"'She begged me not to tell you the truth.'

"'Then get another physician,' I said.

"'I will tell you the whole truth. Night before last I had been out to dinner.'

"'I saw your brilliant speech in the paper. Was it wine-inspired?'

"'Partly. Most of the after-dinner speeches are to a degree. I came home excited by the fine dinner, wit, wisdom and wine of the evening, and went, not to bed, but to the closet and drank heavily. My wife heard me and came down, hoping to coax me upstairs, as she had done many times. But she was too late. My reason and manhood were gone and I pounded her, and left her. She tried to follow me, but fell on the stairs. After a time she crawled, she says, upstairs, and went into the nursery and slept with the little girls. I slept, and woke with a fierce headache, and went out at once, thinking no breakfast and the outdoor air would clear my head for my morning engagements. I pledge you my honor I had forgotten I struck my wife. When I came back last night I found her suffering; but she would not permit a physician should be sent for lest it should disgrace me. I think she really tries to believe that she hurt herself, more or less, when she fell.' And with an honest quiver of the chin he added: 'She is an angel and wine is a devil.'

"'What are winebibbers?'

"'Own children of their father. Is my wife seriously hurt?'

"'I cannot tell yet. I fear she is.'

"More absolute, untiring devotion no man ever gave a wife than he gave her while she lived and suffered. When her noble, true, loving heart ceased to throb he was inconsolable. His love and devotion were the theme of every lip, and the Providence that so afflicted him was called 'strange' in a tone of semicensure! On her tomb is cut: 'Beloved wife!' He has gone to her now, in that land of no license.

"No one but myself ever knew the truth."—Selected, by N. Y. Witness.

DAILY USE OF ALCOHOL.

A Doctor Sets Forth the Constant and Fearful Damage Done to the Brain and Whole Body.

If mankind in general knew what advanced pathology teaches the widely observant physician of the effects of daily alcoholic potations on the human organism the use of alcohol and its principal compounds, natural or artificial, as a habitual daily beverage, would be shunned as a viper is avoided. Daily potations of strong drink persevered in, except in most exceptional moderation, will ultimately undermine the strongest constitutions as insidiously as the wiles of Delilah conquered the mighty Samson. Tridaily potations of strong drink are stitches in the shroud and nails in the coffin of the drinker, by which the garment of life's span is prematurely finished and the funeral casket that transports us to the end of earth is prematurely ready for us.

Alcohol thus indulged in and not physiologically counteracted by an exceptional organism endowed with unusual power of resistance makes morbid changes in the brain, its blood vessels, its coverings and its substance, as well as in the heart and other organs of the body.

The blood vessels of the brain are the first to feel the effects of alcoholic intemperance. They become enormously and unequally distended, and the brain suffers from blood pressure symptoms. Locomotion, perception and ideation are at first embarrassed and finally permanently impaired or destroyed. "We are struck," says the author previously quoted, "by the large number of extremely coarse dilated vessels which afford us evidence also of grave structural change."

Neither does the spinal cord escape, for throughout its whole extent we find increased vascularity. The change in the vessels of the spinal cord is like that which has long been recognized in chronic Bright's disease, says Bevan Lewis.

"Through the medium of the blood vascular system, alcohol, by its ready absorption and permeability, is rapidly conveyed to the most distant parts of the organism, establishing widespread constitutional disturbances; while through the peculiar selective capacity of the nervous centers for this poison it thereupon expends its primary and most potent influence. Although in all cases the nervous centers bear the chief brunt of its attack, it by no means follows that the subjects of chronic alcoholism suffer in the same way. In one, the gastric (stomach); in a second, the hepatic (liver); in a third, the renal (kidneys) and cardiac (heart) symptoms may come to the front; while in others the nervous centers express the special virulence of the agent in their direction.

The general effect of alcoholic excess is depravity of nutrition and impairment of the nutritional fluids and functions; the digestion becomes disordered, the excretory functions become deranged and the nerves exhausted or destroyed. The higher centers of the brain break down in delirium tremens, insanity, dementia or paralysis, or lesser degrees of mental impairment — a paresis, or lesser paralysis, of speech or motion, and aphasia, or speech forgetfulness, and memory failure in general sets in, and thus science confirms the truth of all observation that wine is a mocker, and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise, and to him who tarrieth long thereat or imbibeth oft its organic consequences are physical ruin and dissolution. This temple of the human soul in which a god might dwell and angels walk about can by the unwisdom of the alcoholic inhabitant become transformed into a dwelling place of fiends and furies, can by the diseases it engenders be made the dwelling place of misery and woe, of mind and body, as the testimony of our advancing civilization, with the human wrecks in its dreadful wake, distorted, crippled, dethroned and dead, fearfully prove.

Besides the mental and physical destruction revealed by science in the pathway of alcohol as its immediate effects, she points with pitying finger to woes innumerable in the aftermath of its devastating violence which the hand of municipal and individual charity gathers into the hospitals for the insane, the homes for the feeble-minded, the colonies for epileptics, the almshouses and penitentiaries of the land.

She points the transgressor with warning hand to the mentally and nervously maimed of the children and children's children of the drunkard.

Alas that one should put an enemy in his mouth not only to steal away his own brains but to rob an unerring heritage of that normal mentality which is or should be the inherent right of the innocent and unfit posterity for the battle of life. The testimony of science says: Be cautious! beware! "For in the last it biteth like a serpent." It poisons the blood, the heart, the brain and the nerves. It distorts, depraves, degenerates the organism. It destroys the delicate mechanism of the mind's display and pollutes the fountain source of the soul's manifestation. It burns out the machinery of the mind with fire infernal, and where a spark of divinity might dwell it leaves but the cinders and ashes of a once brightly glowing and glorious mentality.

Its poisoned fangs are like unto those of the stealthy adder in the cradle. Through its baleful influences the unborn come into lives of misery, neurotically and mentally maimed, unfitted for normal life, and fortunate if they fill graves untimely; while hurt and helpless womanhood mourns and dies in the mists and blasts of the world's tardy awakening to the destructive effects of the drink habit. —C. H. Hughes, M. D., in Journal of Inebriety.

SUN WARDS IN HOSPITALS.

They Are Very Largely Instrumental in Curing Many Patients of Disease.

The theory that sunlight exerts a powerfully healing influence upon disease processes has now become so well established that the sunroom is regarded as a necessity in a well-appointed hospital. In the plans of new hospitals that aspire to be up to date the solarium finds a prominent place, and to keep up with the advances of medical science many of the old hospitals are attaching solaria to their buildings, says the Trained Nurse.

The sun ward is easily built. It must be, of course, on the south side of the building, having its eastern, southern and western walls largely constructed of glass. A good plan is to build a large bay window, with metal frame work, and, if the hospital building is to be three or four stories high, this bay window may extend to the full height of the main structure. With this arrangement each floor will have the advantages of a sun ward.

The means of ventilation should be perfect and the heating arrangements adequate, for the sun bath is just as practicable and useful on bright, wintry days as on sunny days of summer. If the outlook from the windows of the solarium is pleasant, if the landscape is diversified with hills, trees, green lawns or fields or a lake or a bit of the ocean, so much the better. Unfortunately for some institutions, the south view from the hospital is limited by walls of brick and stone. Nothing, however, can deteriorate the direct rays of the sun, so that, wherever possible, this exceedingly useful and very cheap commodity should be utilized for therapeutic effects.

AN OBSERVATION CAR.

The Open-Top Chililitli—The Newest Thing in Railway Car Architecture—Its Origin.

The very newest thing in railway car architecture is a passenger car for steam roads, built very much on the lines of the summer trolley car, except that this car can open up the top as well as the sides. The car, an illustration of which is herewith shown, was built by the Pullman Company for The American Tourist Association of Chicago, and was intended as an observation car in the great canyons of mountainous Mexico. The car was invented by Reau Campbell, the Mexican traveler, and came about as follows:

Some years ago, when Mr. Campbell was traveling through the great Tamosopo Canyon, he had a seat on the side of the car next to the mountain, the rocks of the cliff were within two feet of the window, and of course he could get not even a glimpse of the canyon, as all the windows on the other side of the car were taken up by the occupants of the adjoining seats. Determined to view the magnificence of the canyon, Mr. Campbell returned to Las Canoas, and through the courtesy of railway officials made the world famous ride on board what the superintendent called his "trolley", an open car with seats for eight persons, and with this ride came the idea that the only way the magnificence of Mexico's mountains could be enjoyed to the fullest extent would be from a car without sides or top.

The following season a coal, or gondola car, with board seats, was attached to The American Tourist Association train, and every traveler on that train climbed into it. Afterwards the Mexican Government prohibited the carrying of passengers in freight cars, and the coal car had to go. Then the building of a passenger car without a top was decided on, and the Chililitli came in evolution from a work car to the coal car, and to the consummation of itself.

The Chililitli became famous, and from an observation car went on duty as a pavilion by the sea, and a roof garden, for it is electric lighted, and has an outfit of Chinese lanterns. But the favorite is also remembered as a dining car of the tropics, attached to a special train, that, during meal hours, could stand still or run just fast enough to secure a breeze, and not raise a dust.

The Chililitli is the largest observation or dining car ever built. There are seats (reversible as in a coach) for 68 people and when the tables are in place 56 persons may sit down to dinner.

UNIQUE SUIT FOR DAMAGES.

Water Company Asked to Pay Because It Could Not Extinguish a Fire.

A lawsuit, unique in the jurisprudence of the state of California, is now on trial at Ukiah. The city of Ukiah, says a San Francisco exchange, has sued the local waterworks company for a loss of $570.75 by reason of a fire which could not be extinguished because there was no water in the hydrants. The waterworks system of the place consists of a pumping plant on the bank of the Russian river, by which the water is raised to a reservoir on the side of the mountain, from which it is distributed by natural pressure. Fire hydrants are located at all the prominent corners.

On the night of the fire in question the agent of the water company had shut off the water in order to stop the practice of irrigating private lawns in the night time. By reason of this a man had to run a half mile to the reservoir to turn on the water. The delay was fatal, as the block in which the fire originated was almost completely destroyed. Then the city made a demand upon the company for the loss sustained by the city property. The demand was refused on the ground that the water company is not an insurer against fire. The prosecution holds, however, that under the terms of its franchise the water company is bound to maintain at all times a sufficient pressure of water for all purposes, of course including the extinguishment of conflagrations. Should the city win the case all the other losers by the same fire will have a cause of action.

THEY HAVE HARD SERVICE.

Soldiers in the French Foreign Legion Have Anything But an Easy Time.

The French foreign legion, which is again the subject of Parisian political gossip, offers about the hardest military service in the world, and no one who knows enters it until he has exhausted all other means of support or wishes to bury himself, says a London paper. Men of all nations are in its ranks, many of them hard characters, criminals and jailbirds, and it is always sent by France to do the dirty work which that country naturally does not choose to impose upon its own children.

Thus it has held the frontiers of the African colonies, where every now and then a post is cut to bits by a wild Arab tribe. The fever-infested portions of Cambodia and Indo-China, which Lodi has described, have also been the scene of its exploits. The discipline, too, is most severe. Flogging is a daily occurrence and capital punishment is the result of the most trivial offenses. Thus the cases of insanity in the legion are of a much larger number than in any other branch of the French service.

A physician who has been studying the insanity of the legionaries says that a majority of the cases are well developed when the men enlist, since few sane men would ever accept the conditions know to exist in this corps. He adds that in his opinion many men shot for breaches of discipline were not mentally responsible, and he says that the same trouble may cause the insubordination among the French troops with the allies in China.

DEAD TO HER FAMILY.

High-Caste Hindoo Girl Who Was Ostracised Because She Became a Christian.

A young Hindoo girl, a convert to Methodism, has been on a visit to Boston during the past few weeks. Her name is Sooboonagam Ammal, which is shortened to Sooboo for purposes of friendly conversation, says an eastern contemporary.

Sooboo is particularly interesting from the fact that she belongs to a high-caste family—a caste deemed superior in India to ordinary mortal association. The girl heard the mission preachers at first with contempt, but she ended by running away from her aristocratic home to the mission and said she had become a Christian. In leaving her gods behind her she left also her jewels.

First the angry and desperate father came to the mission and threatened to put Sooboo's new friends in jail for kidnaping. The girl was produced and elected to stay where she was. The father went away uttering the final word, "Outcast!" which is a sentence of "death."

But soon the broken-hearted mother, who never goes forth and whose visit to the mission was contamination, came and pleaded with Sooboo to return to the home of those who had reared her and had loved her. The girl declared her love for her mother, but refused to go back. Then came funeral services, as of one dead. The mother, called "accursed" because of her visit to the mission, could not be present, but walked 1,000 miles to the river Ganges and held mourning service there. Then she came home and walled up the door of Sooboo's room.

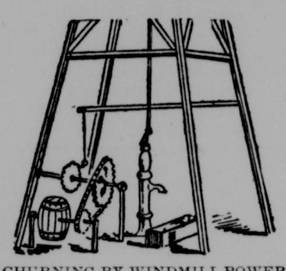
Coloring of the Eskimo Baby.

An Eskimo baby is born fair, except for a dark round spot on the small of the back, varying in size from a three-penny bit to a shilling. From this center head of color the dark tint gradually spreads till the toddling Eskimo is as beautifully and as completely and as highly colored as a well?smoked meerschaum pipe. The same thing happens among the Japanese.—Albany Argus.

CHURNING BY WIND.

There Is No Good Excuse for Doing This Work by Hand in These Days of Machinery.

Churning by wind saves labor; whether the windmill be factory made galvanized iron or some five-dollar homemade go-devil affair matters not. The cut shows the lower portion of a windmill's framework, the power being transmitted by the rod connected with the top of the well. A drive-wheel turned by the windmill, a clutch or ratchet, and a pulley wheel on the churn are the machinery used.



CHURNING BY WINDMILL POWER.

My drive wheel is a silent clutch wheel, but those who have none can use an old mower wheel, as illustrated, with a ratchet wheel on the shaft. An old pinion would make a fair substitute for the ratchet. The catch lever is boxed loosely to the shaft and connected with the pumping rod.

The speed can be changed by having two or more holes in the lever. This device changes the reciprocal motion into circular by means of old castings which can be found on every farm. It will not do to use a piston on a windmill for such a purpose, as it is liable to stop on the "dead center," then when the wind freshens the result would be to smash things unless some one were there to start it past the center. But with the ratchet appliance it needs no watching. The churn always starts when the wind moves the windmill. The upward stroke alone does the work. The momentum of the heavy iron wheel keeps up motion during the down stroke. There is no good excuse for churning by hand and letting the wind fly past.—E. C. Bennett, in Farm and Home.

FINISHING TOUCHES.

They Distinguish the Work of the Progressive Dairyman from That of the Cow-Keeper.

The scrupulous neatness shown in the care of cows; the cleanliness of the stable and the milk vessels; the practice of milking with clean, dry hands and discarding the first streams drawn from each teat; the removal of milk from the stable to a clean milk room for weighing, straining and aeration as soon as it is drawn; keeping the milk at a low temperature in summer and preventing its freezing in winter; careful delivery of the milk or cream in fine condition at the factory; careful attention to the comfort of the cow in summer as well as in winter; to the quality, quantity and composition of the cow's feed and the water supply; forethought and preparation for an abundant supply of pasture or soiling crops, such as will keep up the milk flow summer and winter without interruption during the entire period of lactation; these are some of the finishing touches which distinguish the work of the dairyman from that of a cow-keeper, the practice of the thoroughbred from that of the scrub dairyman.

A well-kept horse and an attractive wagon and harness; a neat, intelligent and obliging deliveryman; shining cans and measures; sterilized, sweet-smelling, well-filled bottles, with the intelligent care of the milk from cow to customer, are some of the finishing touches that build up a retail milk trade at paying prices, and distinguish a thoroughbred dairyman from a scrub cow-keeper and milk-peddler.

In every branch of dairy work, the profit and satisfaction is realized from careful attention to the finishing touches.—Dairy and Creamery.

TIMELY DAIRY NOTES.

Great care should be had in drying up a cow.

A great many spoiled udders can be traced to carelessness in drying up.

Buttermilk is very beneficial in many kinds of stomach troubles, and is healthful for everyone.

Don't expect your milch cow to furnish her quota of milk and butter if she be left to hustle with the rest of the stock. If she is to do her best she must be fed regularly and well, and must be protected from the cold storms and sudden changes of winter. Winter milking don't pay unless the cow is well treated.

Dehorned cattle are more peaceable, easier to fatten, more contented, and can be cared for easier than cattle with horns. While the operation may be painful it is not as cruel as allowing large cattle with horns to harass the smaller animals. The stock owner will save many times the amount of money it will cost him to have his animals dehorned, in feed alone.—Farm Journal.

Cull out the poor layers and give the prolific hens more room to work.

TROUT ON TAP.

A Commercial Traveler Who Got Into the Fish Business in a Queer Way.

In the days when the only means of rapid communication with Eastport was by steamboat from Portland and St. John, N. B., Bert Bean, a commercial traveler, came here from Boston and paid a visit to Campobello island, which belongs to New Brunswick, though only a short distance down the harbor, relates the New York Sun. Bean had a little money, and liking the island he bought a tract of land on top of the hill. His purchase contained about 100 acres, in the middle of which was a small pond in a hollow about 200 feet above tidewater, which washed the shore less than 75 rods away. As the pond was fed by springs, Bean had it stocked with trout, which were caught in brooks on the main land and brought over in pails. Then he went away for four years. On his return the pond was swarming with fine trout. Though the place had been fished by expert anglers, they had never met with any luck, because there were so many caddice worms and other insects in the water that the fish had no need for taking the hook.

Bean consulted a lawyer and found that as his pond contained less than ten acres it was his to hold and protect against all comers. He waited a few years longer and sent down a crew of men who bored a hole from the shore through the bank facing the ocean inserting a water main in the opening. When he had put a turn tap in the pipe so far inside the hill that it would not freeze in winter he was ready to supply fish to order. Orders were taken in Boston and other large places for as many trout as he could furnish. Then Bean came to Campobello, turned the stop cock, drew off the water and picked up his fish as easily as he could kindlings. He always left enough to stock the pond with young fry, after which he closed the faucet and allowed the springs to fill the pond for the growing of more trout.

The House That Tresham Built.

One of the curiosities of architecture in England is, according to the Stone Trades Journal, the house erected about 300 years ago at Rushton, in Northamptonshire, by Sir Thomas Tresham, a Roman Catholic who wished by his design to typify the Trinity. It is all threes: has three sides, three stories, and three windows on each flat, each of them in the shape of the trefoil—the three-leaved shamrock. Where the roofs meet rises a three-sided pyramid, terminating in a large trefoil. The smoke escapes from this chimney by three round holes on each of the three sides. The building is almost covered with mottoes and carvings, three Latin inscriptions, one on each of the three sides, having thirty-three letters in each. Three angles on each side bear shields. Over the door is the text from the Vulgate, "There are three that bear record." Inside the house each corner is cut off from each of the three main rooms, so that on every floor there are three three-sided apartments. It is hardly necessary to add that the house has ceased to be inhabited.

A Great Drive.

There was a loud, hissing noise. The heavens were brilliantly lighted. The man with the crimson coat and the long leather bag stopped and looked upward. He saw what seemed to be a ball of fire coming directly toward him, leaving a long, red streak behind it. Before he could move out of his tracks he heard the object strike the earth a few feet away, and after a short search he found a grayish ball, perhaps 1½ inches in diameter. He stood for a moment gazing thoughtfully down at it. Then he raised his hat, scratched his head solemnly and said: "Holy St. Andrew! What a drive that was!"—Bangor News.

GOVERNOR OF OREGON

Uses Pe-ru-na For Colds in His Family and Grip.

CAPITOL BUILDING, SALEM, OREGON.

A Letter From the Executive Office of Oregon.

The Governor of Oregon is an ardent admirer of Pe-ru-na. He keeps it continually in the house. In a recent letter to Dr. Hartman he says:

STATE OF OREGON,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
SALEM, May 9, 1898.

The Pe-ru-na Medicine Co., Columbus, O.:

Dear Sirs:—I have had occasion to use your Pe-ru-na medicine in my family for colds, and it proved to be an excellent remedy. I have not had occasion to use it for other ailments.

Yours very truly, W. M. Lord.

Any man who wishes perfect health must be entirely free from catarrh. Catarrh is well-nigh universal; almost omnipresent. Pe-ru-na is the only absolute safeguard known A cold is the beginning of catarrh. To prevent colds, to cure colds, is to cheat catarrh out of its victims. Pe-ru-na not only cures catarrh, but prevents. Every household should be supplied with this great remedy for coughs, colds, and so forth.

It will be noticed that the Governor says he has not had occasion to use Pe-ru-na for other ailments. The reason for this is, most other ailments begin with a cold. Using Pe-ru-na to promptly cure colds, he protects his family against other ailments. This is exactly what every other family in the United States should do. Keep Pe-ru-na in the house. Use it for coughs, colds, la grippe, and other climatic affections of winter, and there will be no other ailments in the house. Such families should provide themselves with a copy of Dr. Hartman's free book, entitled "Winter Catarrh." Address Dr. Hartman, Columbus, Ohio.

Dist. No. 7. ANDREW SHARTZER.

WHEN the Democratic party of Maryland has to resort to the enactment of a law to perpetuate its life, no better evidence is required to show that its day of usefulness is at an end. The people have no use for a party that has to depend upon disfranchisement for existence.

OUR attention has been directed to an editorial in the Journal of last week in which the assertion is made upon the authority of an election official that 25 per cent. of the voters of this county are illiterate, when in fact the records in the Supervisors' Office show that at the general registration the percentage of illiteracy among the voters was but 9¼. This is a vast difference and we doubt if any other county in the State can present a better showing. Such assertions are calculated to create a sentiment against the county in other sections and should not be allowed to go unchallenged.

Extra Session Iniquity.

Nobody is misled as to the purpose of those persons who are anxiously urging an extra session of the Legislature, be they a Baughman, a Brown, a Vandiver or a Gorman, it matters not which or who. The movement is simply for the purpose of securing the Democratic machine gang in control of State affairs. The purpose of the proposed call is so obvious that there is almost universal protest from all parts of the State. The very best people are found lined up against the proposition, as they have been for years past, against all infamous political jugglery of the Democratic machine. The cold blooded proposition to disfranchise thousands of voters, which was made with a theatrical attempt at dash by Mr. Baughman, of Frederick county, who has a great pechant for doing things in a manner that attract attention by its ostentation, found little favor with the people. It was almost snuffed out by the coldness of the reception accorded it by the good people of the State on account of its infamy, and by a number of the members of the ring who believe it inexpedient and unwise. Notwithstanding this fact, the ring, with its well known tenacity in all things that are evil, now attempts to veil the real purpose of the proposed call behind an enumeration, which is entirely unnecessary, and also entirely untenable. The enumeration, as proposed, would mean a small army of appointees, whose pay and expenses, with the expense of the compilation of the figures thus gathered and returned according to the orders of the ring, would mean an addition of thousands of dollars to the public debt and a corresponding increase in taxes. An increase debt and taxes is a strking characteristic of Democratic ring rule, but a foible which the people, however, are grown very weary.

The sewerage proposition for Baltimore city can scarcely be sufficient pressing to entail an extra session of the Legislature for the proper authorization of it. It is trotted out by the Democratic politicians as a reason for the calling of the extra session, but the proposition is so palpably absurd that it accentuates to the highest possible degree the deep dyed rascality of the whole extra session project.

In the first place it is not believed that the Democratic ring in light of the drubbings that have been recently administered to it, will dare to call an extra session, as it is fair to presume that the wily leader of the ring, the Hon. A. P. Gorman, has enough foresight to see what will be the inevitable consequence of such a step. Then again, it is hardly probable, if the Legislature should happen to be convened, that there would be found enough men in that body who are so enthralled by the ring who would lay down their manhood in the slough of ring dominition and forever besmirch their reputation by voting for the law to disfranchise the citizens of the State. And in the third place should there be found enough men so devoid of all sense of right and duty to enact the iniquitous legislation proposed by the ring, the good people of the State would join hands and administer such a rebuke to the gang that it would be forever blotted out of existence.

Bryan For a Third Time.

It is given out on what seems to be trustworthy authority that William J. Bryan will be a candidate a third time for the presidency.

Since his second overwhelming defeat, there has been a movement looking to a "reorganization" of the Democratic party. Mr. Cleveland has become talkative, and Mr. Hill of New York has hopes. The reorganization movement is fostered by Gold Democrats.

Those who stood by Bryan in two losing fights contend that no reorganization is needed. All that is wanted, say these Bryan leaders, is for the Gold Democrats to quit kicking and to get in line for the party platforms and candidates. These regulars plainly do not intend to let the anti-Bryan men get control of the party organization.

To head off this "reorganization" scheme, Congressman Lentz, of Ohio and other Bryan leaders have appointed a dollar dinner to be held at Columbus, O., on February 12th, at which none but true blue Bryan Democrats are to be invited. This banquet will sound the keynote and formally launch the third Bryan campaign.

Meanwhile, Mr. Bryan has started a newspaper, in which to keep himself prominently before the country. If he can't be president, his friends propose to see at least that certain other Democrats never shall be.

Requiescat in Pace.

When (in the noon of her reign) England's sovereign lady whose mortal remains were laid in the tomb Monday, suffered the irreparable loss which made her after life a long period of mourning it was Tennyson, the supreme poet of the Victorian era, who raised his voice and prayed for the widowed Queen that

The love of all Thy sons encompass Thee,
The love of all Thy daughters cherish Thee,
The love of all Thy people comfort Thee,
Till God's love set Thee at his side again!

The fulfilment has come. Victoria and Albert, parted in life, are now joined in death. And if the love of her people, which the poet besought, could have comforted inconsolable grief than that, too, would have been accomplished.

"O, that peace may come!" These are reported to have been Victoria's last words. Touching in their revelation of the tenderness of the speaker's heart, they are doubly touching as indicating the grief that pressed most heavily upon her in her last moments. What did the glory of victory signify to her by comparison with the suffering it entailed on the mothers and widows of the men who were laid low or maimed for life down on the African veldt? Thus the grave is closing over one who was lifted higher than any other mortal of our time, but who was not permitted to be exempt in her last days from the sorrows inherent in humanity. May she rest in peace!

How to Get Good Permanent Roads.

Last week it was announced through these columns that Congressman George A. Pearre of this district was arranging through the Department of Agriculture at Washington to send road engineers to Allegany county to give instruction to the people in road making. Such a move should not be discouraged and we may add that it will not be by any thinking tax payer who sees the necessity of the money-making powers of good roads. Should the experiment in Allegany county prove successful why not have the engineers come up to Garrett and instruct our people in the modus operandi of building and maintaining good roads. But the first thing to be done in this direction is to provide the money with which to make the talked-of improvements. This can readily be done by a slight additional tax upon the property owners of the county who would not feel the added burden in contemplation of the smooth and rutless road such as we have in our minds eye.

"It is estimated that a quarter of a million of dollars is spent every year by the tax payers of the State without material or permanent improvement as the result," says the Baltimore Sun in an editorial treating upon the subject of the betterment of the highways of Maryland, and adds: "The State Geologist and his corps of able assistants have shown that in all parts of Maryland abundant material exists for making good roads, and that all we need is proper control of the work * * * and a well-planned system to give this State the best permanent roads to be found anywhere in the land. This is so fully realized by the people and tax payers that in some counties heroic struggles are going on for reforms in road management and construction. In Harford county public-spirited citizenship has eventuated in the Woolsey bequest of a sum sufficient to start the reform there with the voluntary aid of the State Geologist and his assistants. The Agricultural Department at Washington has but lately organized a division of roads for the purpose of instructing county officials in what they ought to have known before they ventured to assume office, if they are really ignorant. But it is not so much ignorance that keeps the money going out as fast as it comes in for poor service and no improvement to the roads. It is the misuse of the people's money in a pretense instead of employing it for permanent betterments that is complained of by the tax payers. The wastefulness is shameful and a reproach to nearly every county in the State. The signs, however, are encouraging the hope that old methods will have to give way to the new order of things and that everywhere people will be employed who will leave behind them permanent benefits instead of a pile of trash scraped from the ditch into the middle of the road, only to be washed back by the first rain."

FIRST TIME IN 28 YEARS

President of the United States Will Be His Own Successor.

On March 4 next, for the first time in twenty-eight years, a President of the United States will be his own immediate successor. It is a point that lends picturesque interest to the coming inauguration, the last occasion on which such a thing occurred having been in 1872, when General Grant began his second term.

Mr. McKinley will ride from the White House to the Capitol alone to deliver his address—a thing which has not happened since 1872. It occurred also in 1868, but that was because Andrew Johnson was unfriendly to Grant, and refused to accompany him, just as John Adams would not go with Jefferson under similar circumstances and for the same reason. Being at once the outgoing and the incoming Chief Executive of the nation, Mr. McKinley will occupy a carriage alone.

At about half-past ten o'clock on the morning of March 4 the Republican leader on the floor of the House will rise and move that a committee be appointed to wait upon the President and inform him that the Congress has just completed its work and is about to adjourn, incidentally inquiring whether he has anything further to communicate to the national legislative body. The motion being carried, the Speaker will name five members for this purpose, and, a like step having been taken at the other end of the Capitol, the ten selected Representatives and Senators will proceed to the Executive Mansion in carriages. On their return they will report that they saw the President, and that he stated, while having no communication to make, he desired to convey to the Congress his thanks and congratulations on the work accomplished by it.

If Mr. Bryan had been elected Mr. McKinley, on his way to the Capitol with him, would have sat on his right, occupying the place of honor as the de facto President, but, having relinquished his office, he would have sat on the other side coming back, being then a mere private citizen. This is what will happen on March 4, 1905, when a new Chief Magistrate is inaugurated, and then the latter will do all the bowing, Mr. McKinley not even removing his hat, inasmuch as it is understand under such circumstances that the plaudits are addressed exclusively to the executive that is to be.

Of course a great parade, including many thousands of troops, will escort Mr. McKinley to and from the Capitol. It will be abominably cold and very likely raining, at all events it usually is such weather in Washington on March 4 and the President will take a hasty luncheon with a few friends in the private dining room at the White House before going out and exposing himself to the hazard of pneumonia on the temporary grand stand on front whereon he reviews the procession.

EXTRA SESSION PLANS NOT YET AGREED UPON.

What a Member of the Bar Thinks About the Proposition to Summon the Legislature to Act Against Illiterate Voters.

Sunday's Baltimore Herald.

Governor Smith has not yet declared himself upon the subject of an extra session of the Legislature. His Excellency was at his office but a little while yesterday, and nothing new developed concerning the possibility of a call for the General Assembly to meet.

Mr. William C. Smith, a member of the bar, expressed his views on the proposed extra session yesterday, as follows:

"No one can rightfully accuse the Republican party of being opposed to the purity of the ballot. Its history in Maryland is the story of the fight for a free vote and an honest count. Hence, when we are opposed to an extra session of the Legislature that opposition is based upon grounds apart from considerations touching the ballot itself. Our party sees in this extra session scheme the germs of a great political conspiracy, the real object of which is to entrench democracy in power for an indefinite term of years and to place Maryland where she was before 1895. For 30 years the democrats absolutely controlled the State, yet all that time nothing was heard that would indicate an anxiety about the illiterate vote, and probably because, under pressure the illiterates voted Jackson and Liberty straight without asking embarrassing questions. Indeed, when efforts were made to improve the ballot all opposition came from our now sanctimonious friends, and it is an instructive commentary upon them and their sham anxiety lest the state should be dominated by the ignorant classes that the only good election law ever adopted for this state was conceived and passed by that very party which they charge is entirely in the control of the illiterates. The brightest pages in Maryland's political history are those which record the events of the republican administration under Governor Lowndes. Let the highly intelligent, superanxious ring potentates beat it if they can.

"The democrats were silent from 1867 to 1895 concerning the illiterate vote; so also were they beautifully still on this absorbing topic in the legislative session of 1900, when, with all the power in their hands, they could have accomplished anything. Someone did say something about disfranchisement during the session, but his oration was cut short by the powers upon the ground that it was improper to discuss such a subject. If improper then, why proper now? Especially as an extra session means so much to the taxpayers. The real reason is not far to seek. The secret ballot provided for in the republican law of 1896 prevents coersion and makes the result of an election delightfully uncertain. Therein it hurts the ring, who yearn for the good old days when primaries could be forced and nominations jammed through, and when the nomination was the equivalent of election. Then business could be carried on on business principles and there were no slip-ups. Everything was greased and went through according to program. Small wonder, then, that the sanctimonious deacons of the democratic church have gathered themselves together in an experience meeting, and, with hands piously folded before them, roll their eyes heavenward, exclaiming: 'Oh! This illiteracy! Shocking! Shocking! Brethren, let us cast out these ignorant devils and Sister Maryland will surely be ours forever.'"

Pity and Beauty

The most beautiful thing in the world is the baby, all dimples and joy. The most pitiful thing is that same baby, thin and in pain. And the mother does not know that a little fat makes all the difference.

Dimples and joy have gone, and left hollows and fear; the fat, that was comfort and color and curve--all but pity and love--is gone.

The little one gets no fat from her food. There is something wrong; it is either her food or food-mill. She has had no fat for weeks; is living on what she had stored in that plump little body of hers; and that is gone. She is starving for fat; it is death, be quick!

Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil is the fat she can take; it will save her.

The genuine has this picture on it, take no other.

If you have not tried it, send for free sample, its agreeable taste will surprise you.

TAX ON MORTGAGES.

Judge A. Hunter Boyd Decides That the Law is Constitutional.

Chief Judge A. Hunter Boyd has filed a decision at Hagerstown holding the mortgage tax law of 1896 constitutional. The opinion in the case against the Mutual Insurance Company of Washington county, which holds a long list of mortgages, sued, with a score of other corporations and individual mortgage holders, by the Washington county commissioners for the mortgage tax, which they refused to pay. The only question raised in this case was the constitutionality of the act.

The court cites the fact that the Court of Appeals has already expressed the opinion that the law was constitutional in the case of Faust vs. Building Association, and recently in the Harford county case. As to the reasonableness of the tax Judge Boyd says it is less than one-half per cent. of the par value of a 6 per cent. mortgage and cannot be considered unreasonable. There is no county in Maryland where the tax is so low as 30 cents on the $100, and the state tax has not been as low as 12 cents for years, if ever on most assessable property. If mortgages could be entirely exempted there would seem no valid excuse why the legislature could not exempt them in part, provided all of the same class be uniformly taxed. If the taxation be less than that of most property mortgage holders can hardly complain.

The propriety of taxing mortgages at all is questioned by many, and it may be that this tax was a compromise made by the legislature. The object was doubtless to add to the revenue from a class of property not paying taxes, but as the effect of such taxation might be to drive capital out of the state the legislature may have thought it wise to impose a light tax and make the amount uniform, so as not to discriminate against those counties where the taxes are most burdensome.

If it had simply been provided that mortgages should be taxed as other property and that the tax should be paid in the county where the mortgaged property was situated residents of a county that had a tax of $1 on the $100 could not as readily get loans on mortgages as those of a county where the tax was less.

DIRT CLEARANCE.

IT is a good plan for every bather to know something of the soap he uses. There is a well-founded objection to using a floor-cleaning soap upon the human body. Ivory Soap is the bather's soap. It costs more than common soaps, but the difference is in the ingredients and making. Why not treat yourself with a little respect. Is not the human skin with its marvellous delicacy entitled to pure soap? Ivory Soap—it floats.

SIXTH DISTRICT INTERESTED.

How New Reapportionment in the Maryland House Will Bring Changes.

The reapportionment of representatives in the Maryland House of Delegates will likely cause a political shaking up in the Sixth district. Representation of the counties in district conventions is the same as in the General Assembly, and heretofore two counties—Allegany and Frederick—have had exactly half the votes in convention, their six votes each, when combined, balancing the five of Washington, four of Montgomery and three of Garrett. For some reason or other divisions in conventions of both parties have usually been on these lines. Allegany and Frederick combining against Washington, Montgomery and Garrett, until by some means one side could capture votes from the other and break the deadlock. This was the division the last time there was a contest of any importance in the Sixth district when the late Republican congressional convention was held.

Under the reapportionment Washington and Montgomery counties will each have one additional vote in the the convention. This will give Washington, Montgomery and Garrett counties 14 out of a total of 26 votes, so that in any line-up of the old combinations Allegany and Frederick counties would be out in the cold. New combinations among the politicians of the district are, therefore, expected.

Danger of Colds and La Grippe.

The greatest danger from colds and la grippe is their resulting in pneumonia. If reasonable care is used, however, and Chamberlain's Cough Remedy taken, all danger will be avoided. Among the tens of thousands who have used this remedy for these diseases we have yet to learn of a single case having resulted in pneumonia, which shows conclusively that it is a certain preventive of that dangerous malady. It will cure a cold or an attack of la grippe in less time than any other treatment. It is pleasant and safe to take. For sale by all druggists.

They find a ready sale here and that portion which is not used for local consumption is shipped to points both east and west where the crops were almost total failures.

Editor Harmsworth, the enterprising young man who has achieved a phenomenal success with his London newspaper and other publications, has said that in the first instance his business florished because of the enormous amount of advertising which he placed in the daily newspapers. When he was asked whether he used other forms of publicity Mr. Harmsworth said: "No; I don't because I don't believe in them. We tried them and found they did not pay us. We pin ourselves strictly to newspaper advertising, and we know it is a good investment. We always use large spaces."

THE CASSELMAN VALLEY.

Its Timber, Coal, Agricultural Resources, Roads and Schools.

To the Editor of the Republican.

The Casselman valley, extending from the State Line to the headwaters of the river, fifteen miles in length, averaging about eight miles in width from the top of Meadow mountain to the crest of Negro mountain, containing about sixty thousand acres of the finest cultivated lands in this county, with a population of 2500. Among the chief products may be mentioned coal, cattle, lumber, lime, butter, fruit, sugar and wool. High grade farming is seen in this valley. The buildings are large and commodious. The stock of the finest breeds. It is estimated that one hundred thousand dollars worth of produce is annually shipped out of this valley. Those familiar with the geology of this county assert we have at least fifty thousand acres underlaid with the four-foot vein of coal, valued at one million dollars; lumber, ties and prop timber valued at one-half million dollars; other valuable minerals in abundance, inexhaustible deposits of the best of lime. Thus it will be seen our resources are but partly developed.

The competition of the railroad will open a new era in this section of the county. Many inquiries are being made as to coal and mineral lands. Great quantities of ties, props and lumber are now ready for shipment. The optioning of large areas of coal lands is frequently spoken of and many inquiries as to prices. It is nonsense to talk of securing such tracts at reasonable figures at present. Little is definitely known as to the area underlaid even with the four-foot vein. Many doubts are expressed as to the existence or value of lower or larger veins. Tests have been made by coal operators at various points in the valley. The results are known only to the company making them. It would seem wise and businesslike for the larger land owners to raise sufficient funds to make a thorough test with a core drill by experts, thus definitely determining what veins of coal we have, their extent and value. The four-foot vein has been pretty thoroughly tested and its extent fairly well known.

The condition of our roads and schools are subjects for most serious consideration, comment and criticism. Their improvement concerns all. We must mend our ways if we expect to attract desirable people to locate among us. No excuse or explanation can be offered for the neglect and abandonment of our highways. The old pike, our only outlet to market, is almost impassable by freight vehicles this season of the year. What little the county expends upon this road appears to be lost. The magnificent bridge over the Casselman river at the "Little Crossings" is in a runious condition and if not given early attention will be destroyed. The Western Union Telegraph Company have damaged the pike badly, the bridge almost fatally. This company should be compelled to repair some of the damages they have done to this great thoroughfare. A final effort should be made to save this splendid structure.

The county road from Grantsville to Oakland is even in worse condition, if possible. Really communication between this section and the county seat is practically destroyed by the impassability of the roads. Something should be suggested to remedy or improve this sad state of affairs. Other counties are moving in this matter. It is said we have the worst roads in the State.

Our schools are not up to the standard, at least in this section of the county, but they appear to be satisfactory to the patrons. They can and will be improved when the parents of the children attending take interest in the cause of education, demanding better service, attendance and attention. The teaching and training of children is and always has been the most important question parents have to meet and solve. It is senseless and useless to quarrel with teachers and officials. The parents are the parties interested. They can improve or disorganize and destroy schools. This is an enlightened age. The public schools are supposed to educate the masses. The higher grades of employment require skilled and educated operatives—the ignorant are relegated to the ranks of common labor. If we wish our children to have a fair start in the "life struggle" we should see to it that our schools are "abreast of the times." Taxes for this purpose are willingly paid—thus the means provided. A great responsibility rests upon the parents of this generation.

THOUGHT IT WAS ROBBERS.

Mountaineers Mistook a Wrecking Train For Burglars.

Early Saturday morning a wreck, made doubly disastrous by the peculiar escapade of the wrecking train which had gone to relieve the wreck, occurred on the 17 mile grade of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. A young man, his father and a shotgun also figured in the escapade in a strikingly interesting manner.

A heavily loaded freight coming down the grade jumped the track, smashing to pieces 10 cars, one of which dashed against and almost through the house of a mountaineer alongside the track. Believing that burglars were uncermoniously attempting to enter their unassuming home the father and young men of the house jumped from their beds, and clad only in their night robes, rushed out into the yard armed with the most formidable looking guns to defend their mountain domicile. Seeing the badly smashed-up cars and the excited train crew, warlike demonstrations were ceased, and after dressing themselves the mountain men assisted the railroaders in clearing the result of the wreck.

The wrecking train was sent from here and after getting the wreck straightened out got beyond control while switching above the wrecked train, and ran down against it, mashing several other cars.—Cumberland Times.

LIKE UNTO STORM SWEPT GALVESTON

By Paul P. Harris.

(Written for this paper.)

"SO YO'RE gwine ovah thar to Galveston, air yo', so that the world kin know how 10,000 human critters giv' up their lives. Wuz you evah in one uf them coast storms, stranger? Did yo' evah happen to be roun' when the sea swep' things clar fo' miles, leavin' only hyar en thar a poo' stranded cuss to mourn the loss of loved ones? No? Thank God fo' thet, stranger.

"When Ah saw thet thar line in the mo'nin Picayune ez we wuz pullin' out f'm New Orleans, 'Ten Thousand Dead, Twenty Thousand Injured,' Ah wondered how many readers thar wuz ez would really know what thet thar meant. Tain't them thet go down beneath the waves that hez mah deepes' pity. Goin' down don' las' long. Ah speaks, suh, uf them thet hez to stan' by helpless en see those thet he hol's a thousan' times dearer then life itself swep' away by the mad, rushing tide. Ah ain't agwine fah yo're way, stranger. Ah hev to get off at Crowley, but Ah reckon Ah sh'll hev time to tell yo'. It's just barly possible thet yo' en Ah shall meet agin en ef we don' mebbe yo'll see fit to tell them thar no'then newspaper fellers thet Ah hearn yo' say thet yo' worked fo' mah little story of Edwin en Genie.

"Ah wuz livin' down near the bayou Cook, Plaquemine parish, sixty odd mile below New Orleans, in those days, not fah f'm Buras township. Genie wuz a creole. She wuz plain en simple uf dress, sweet en Heavenly, suh. When Ah think uf her Ah seem to heah the ring of distant church bells ez the' used to ring when she, a little miss uf twelve er tharabouts, in snow-white gown en with a sprig uf jessamine er valley lilies in her ha'r used to trip erlong past our plantation uf a Sunday mo'nin' on her way to our parish church. Like the church bells, her mission seemed to be to summon souls to bettah things. The' wuzent much about her pedigree to brag on, but, stranger, if yo' could hev took one look into them deep blue eyes with the long dark lashes, yo' would hev allowed thet the' hed cornered all the sunshine. Ah took that look mahself, suh, an' Ah hevent seen the sun shine elsewhar since.

"Edward—Ah calls him thet, now—hed everythin' to brag on in the way uf pedigree, en, ez Ah look at it now, in everythin' else thet goes to make up the gentleman, but he nevah said much about hisself. Neither of his parents wuz livin' en he wuz pretty much alone in the worl'. He wuz tall, broad shouldered en han'some. He come f'm up yo're way somewhar, New York state, Ah reckon. Mebbe yo' know uf him er his family. Las' name wuz Noble. Ah cayent figure it thet he could hev been bettah named unless it would have been Noble Edward Noble; thet's what Ah hev on his tombstone now; but Ah'm getting ahead uf mah story.

"Edward en Ah wan' the bes' uf fren's f'm the fust, though the fault uf thet wuz altogether mine. Ah hed been used to hevin' things pretty much mah own way. Mah paw hed the bes' plantation in the parish, suh. It hed been in our family sence Jackson's army moved on New Orleans en our bottom lan' crop uf rice en cane wuz, Ah reckon, the bes' thet grew. Mah parents hed set a heap on me, en Ah remembah well the day thet mah maw (she wuz f'm the proudes' family in the lan', suh), tole me thet she hoped she would nevah liv to see the day thet a son of hers would take to wife a low-bohn creole, en the tears thet dimmed her eyes, suh, kep' me f'm sayin' what Ah should hev been sorry fo'. Genie wa'n't low bohn, nohow, stranger.

"Befo' many days hed passed, Ah hed asked her to be mine, an', though she nevah quite consented, the' wuz moments thar thet Ah felt ez though it wuz only a matter uf time when she would give in, en when once, stranger, Ah thought thet Ah saw the love light shine in them dear blue eyes, mah heart seemed sho' enough to stan' still en mah breath came short en quick. The' wuz the sunshine days, suh.

"Edward came down to study the effect uf various fertilizers on our long staple cotton en thet itself wuz enuff to set the fiah a smolderin'. We felt in them days just aftah the war more than we do now thet the south wuz fully able to see to the cotton raisin' er anythin' else ez fah ez thet goes, down in Dixie, without the intervention uf Yankees with any uf their dog gone scientific ideas. What at fust diden' amoun' to much broke out into a full flame uf hatred when Ah saw thet Edward had his eye on mah Genie. Ah saw them standin' together once, under the big pecan tree in front uf her house ez Ah wuz ridin' past. Mah fust impulse wuz to pass on ez though Ah hedent noticed, then the foolishness uf thet came to me en I reined up short. The' w'a'nt the slightes' embarrassment in his look ez he waved me 'How de,' but if Ah hed tried Ah coulden' to hev saved mah life hev answered. Ah just sat there en glared like a stupid gawk till it seemed ez if An should burn up with shame en anger, en, when he spoke agin in his calm, courteous way, Ah struck him a vicious cut across the face with mah ridin' whip, en, diggin' the rowels into mah hoss, dashed on. Lookin' back ovah mah shoulder, Ah saw a sight thet in memory Ah see now daily. Thar wuz a bloody mark that mah whip had lef', but his face bore no trace of anger; the' wuz nothin' but pity en grief thar. Mah Genie had sprung to his side, en' stranger, when Ah saw thet them eyes uf hern wuz, sho' enuff, shinin' the love light ez they looked into his, hope lef' mah life, but Ah made up mah min' thet, if Ah, who wuz willin' to give up mah home en birthright fo' her, coulden' hev her, no one else should, en Ah took an oath, suh, thet the'd be a killin', en either thet cold-blooded Yankee er Ah should bite the dus'. Ah diden' care much which did which sence Ah hed seen whar the love light shone.

Ah diden' see him fo' many days, en Ah reckon that it wuz well thet Ah diden', but Ah did see Genie, fo' she came direc' to the levy cane patch whar she knew Ah was workin' the niggas. She hed hed a right smart walk, though their plantation wuz nex' to ours. Her face wuz flushed, showin' to bes' advantage her rich olive skin thet shone in such pleasin' contrast to the eyes with the fringe of dark lashes. Ah diden' even get off f'm mah hoss, suh. Ah'd hev fallen at her feet the day befo', but the day befo', Ah haden' seen whar the love light shone, but nevah min' about thet, suh. Ah felt all undone, though she diden' say a word thet she shoulden' hev. They want even a reasonable amoun' uf scold in her voice, considerin' what Ah hed done, but Ah saw thet the' wuz nothin' fo' me to look fo' in the blue eyes, nothin' ceptin an unfathomable well of pity.

"Ah, says to her: 'He cayent love yo ez Ah do, Genie, ez Ah do, who hev grown up with yo', en learned to love the whole worl' ca's you live in it, Genie. Yesterday, Ah'd hev thought it bettah to hev lived down on the poo' plantation across the river if Ah could hev seen yo' smile sometimes en hev known that the love light thar wuz fo' me then to hev lived on the mos' princely estate in the lan' without yo', Genie. Hain't we gwine to meet no mo' down in the lane whar the magnolias grow? Ah love yo' so, honey, Ah'd die fo' yo' a thousan' times rather then see yo' care fo' another. Yo're Yankee hain't got none uf thet kin' uf love fo' you, Genie. He hain't got even the spirit to resent an insult—but Ah got no further, the look she giv me, well, Ah nevah saw its like befo'.

"It wuz a Sunday afternoon in September thet the storm broke on the Louisiana coast. All thet afternoon she raged fiercer en fiercer. Ah hed been out on the rivah in the mo'nin' fishin' fo' croppies till the storm begin to rize, en finally drove me in. The 'Mississip' is pretty wide down thar. It's only about fo'ty mile above whar she breaks up into a score uf mouths en goes into the gulf. The neck uf lan we were on wuz near enuff, not mo'n eight miles wide, the rivah included, an' we hed a wide sweep uf sea on either side.

"Ah lay eroun the wearhouse mos' uf that afternoon. Our warehouse had the highes' an' bes' foundation in the parish. The flo' stood just even with the top uf the levy. We used to run the trucks laden with cotton bales, f'm thar straight out ovah skids to the levy, en f'm thar out ovah the long pier to the boats fo' New Orleans. Thet afternoon Ah thought a score uf times thet the win' would pick us up en toss us into the middle uf the rivah en to'ads dark Ah thought that Ah would take no mo' chances en Ah wen' home en soon to bed.

"Ah had been sleepin' fo' some hours when Ah wuz awaken' by a poundin' on the side doo' by mah windo.' Paw er maw wuz sleepin' then en Ah went to the doo' quietly. Ah foun' a family uf neighbors. Their house hed blown down, stranger. F'm then on till midnight they kep a comin'; sometimes a hull family, but mo' often the'd be some lackin'; en occasionally some one'd start back through the shriekin' night, lookin' for wife er little ones. It mus' hev been two o'clock er tharabouts when the watah began to come in, fust creepin' a little, then growin' stronger en stronger till the flo' wuz kivered with right smart uf watah, while outside we could see only ragin' storm.

"Ah hed hearn paw tell how yars ago the win' hed swep' the sea f'm the gulf right across our narrer neck uf lan' en hed lan'ed a full-rigged ship whar our orange grove hed sence been planted. Ah calcerlated thet paw was thinkin' uf thet, though Ah don' reckolec' thet he said a word thet night 'ceptin' when the watah got so deep en our solid ole house began to shake in the surgin' sea en the wind, he picked maw up in his arms ez though she had been a baby en, turnin', said: "To the wear house."

"Ah, mahse'f, caught two little ones, chillen uf neighbors uf ours en placed one on each shoulder. The' wuz few stronger then Ah in them days, stranger, but it took every muscle Ah hed to face thet storm. Ah knew thet we wuz out uf the path, fo' twice Ah tripped en nearly fell. Mah foot hed caught in a tangle uf garden cow peas. Ah kep' ez near ez possible to paw en Ah heard mah prayin' fo' all on us. About half uf our numbah reached the wearhouse. The res', God help them, the' wen' down. Ah knew every chick en chile uf them. Ah wuz surprised to see thet many f'm other directions hed reached the wearhouse befo' us. The' wuz some uf the La Dues, the Valentines, the Loraines en the Valiquettes. Ah looked eagerly fo' mah Genie, but she wan't thar nor were any of her kin. Ah went to the rear of the house en saw thet the rivah was full en knew thet the watah mus' be pourin' ovah the levy in the terrible flood up yondah.

"Ah saw a man crouchin' on the levy en peerin' out ovah the watah. Ah hed crope mos' to his side befo' Ah noticed thet Ah wuz thar, en when he turned Ah saw thet it wuz Edward. He wuz bar'headed en his clothes wuz torn a'mos' to rags. Ah knew thet he hed been stopped by the fo'ce of the storm f'm goin' to Genie. He caught mah han' fo' a moment en we looked each othah in the eye. The' wan' a word spoke, but thet grip en thet look sealed the bond fo' evah.

"Ah hed just turned eroun' en wuz startin' back when the' came a terrible blast uf win', en to keep f'm bein' carried into the rivah Ah crouched low on the levy. Ah heard a creakin', schriekking crash en the wearhouse wuz gone, stranger. Ah struggled to mah feet en, shoutin', plunged aftah the tossin', grindin' wreck, fightin' en prayin' to fin' mah parents. A piece of floatin' wreckage struck mah head en, half conscious, chokin', blinded, chilled en exhausted, Ah b'arly made mah way to the levy agin. Ah coulden' tell yo' what all happened durin' the res' uf thet night, though some triflin' things impressed themselves upon me with startlin' distinctness. At one time, when the waves washed clean ovah me, Ah noticed with momentary surprise the salty taste of the watah, then Ah remembered thet the flood wuz f'm the sea en not the rivah. At another time Ah placed mah hand on somethin' hard en scaly, en when it began to move Ah realized thet it wuz a moccasin snake. It wuz too scared to strike, suh.

"Daylight broke en Ah looked about fo' Edward. At fust Ah coulden' see hide nor ha'r uf him nor uf eny other livin' human critter, though the' wuz some uf mos' every other sort uf animal en reptile thar. The' wuz hogs en cattle, hosses, sheep, en every hyar en thar a wrigglin' snake. Ah don' believe thet Noah made any bettah showin'. Ah saw mah saddle hoss Bill, the thoroughbred thet mah uncle gev me yars befo', en Ah whistled shrill on mah fingahs ez Ah used to do to call him up f'm the pastur'. He answered with a glad whinney en worked his way along agin the storm to whar Ah wuz crouchin', en he rubbed his nose again mah shoulder en whinnied soft like ez though he wuz glad to see me livin'. His eyes wuz almos' human.

"Ah twisted mah fingahs in his long, wet mane, en, puttin an arm eroun' his neck, stood ereck en' looked fah away up the line uf the levy toward the plantation whar Genie lived. Ah saw a man's figure in the distance en Ah knew it mus' be Edward. Ah worked mah way carefully erlong, still holdin' on to Bill en the cattle en sheep moved on erhead ez though they wuz glad to be driven. Ah kivered a mile er mo' in this way en could see the old pecan tree on the Dupree plantation wavin en' tossin' in the storm, but the house wuz gone. Lookin' up the levy agin, Ah saw Edward standin' recklessly en wavin' his arms frantic like en lookin' to the windward uf the levy. Lookin' again to the pecan tree, Ah saw three pussons, one mah Genie en mah heart beat fas'. Ah whistled en hollered at the top uf mah voice to Edward, but coulden' get his attention. Ah saw him strip off his coat en plunge into the ragin' sea during a brief lull in the sto'm. Ah hurried on ez fas' ez Ah dared. Two er three times it looked ez though he would be beaten back agin the levy or thrown clar over into the runnin' rivah beyond. He swam mos'ly below the surface with a wonderful en peculiar stroke. Ah could see him only at intervals ez he rose on the crest uf a wave en Ah thought uf mah words to Genie: 'Yo'r Yankee hez no sich love ez mine fo' yo' Genie,' ez Ah saw him gallantly buffet the waves. Genie wuz motionless, en Ah knew that she was prayin' fo' Edward.

"He had kivered half or mo' uf the distance when the sky became suddenly black en the sto'm came on full fo'ce agin. The win' hed whipped eroun' to the no'thwest en came on fiercer then evah. Ah dared not stan' ereck en crouched agin on the levy. Ah could see the peach tree bendin' befo' the sto'm till its branches whipped the surgin' sea into madder fury. A great wave swep' ovah me en Ah fell flat agin on the levy. Ah caught a palmetto root and clung fo' life. At times Ah wuz completely submerged fo' several seconds till the wind, veering mo' en mo', finally came direck f'm the no'th, sweeping the watah south to the gulf with such fo'ce thet the levy seemed the dividin' line between two rivahs racing each othah to the sea. Aftah an hour or mo' the watah began to lower till the top of the levy was well above the tide. Ez soon ez the heavens cl'ared Ah looked agin to the pecan tree. The' was but two figures thar. Genie wuz gone en the swimmer wuz nowhar to be seen. The nex' day the relief boats steamed down the rivah f'm New Orleans. They wanted to take us away, but we coulden' hev left thar ef we hed tried. They lef' us a little bacon en cohn meal en blankets, en ez soon as the sto'm subsided enuff we wuz ready to take up our search.

"Ole man Dupre said Genie hed been the life en hope uf them all till thet las' blas' when she seen her lover go down, en then the ole man diden' know what happened. He looked eroun' en she wan' thar nor could anything be seen uf her on the waves about. She mus' hev just drapped en giv up entirely. The ole man en Ah went togethah, en fah down country among some cypress trees we foun' all thet they wuz lef' uf Genie, en not much further we foun' Edward en in his clinched hand we found a miniature of Genie. The scar on his cheek where Ah struck him the day with the ridin' whip stood clar en distink, en Ah always stop en think uf thet scar now whenevah Ah feel inclined to be hasty. It saves me ez the scars sustained on Calvary saved many another poo' human. Ah foun' no trace uf mah paw er mah maw nor uf ery others thet went down in the early hours uf thet sto'm.

"The ole gentleman en Ah sold our plantation en bought a little strip uf lan' up hyar whar the floods ain't likely to come, an' hyar we took Edward en Genie. The ole man en the ole woman hev both gone now en Ah'm lef' alone to keep watch. 'Ten thousan' dead en twenty thousan' injured, eh?' When yo' write yo'r story, stranger, arter yo' hev paid due tribute to th' dead, don' fo'get to make it clar thet the worl' still hez some sympathy lef' fo' them thet watch en wait."

TOLD BY X RAYS.

A German Scientist Says That the Duration of Life May Be Foretold.

Is it possible to foretell the duration of a man's life?

In spite of certain preposterous claims put forward from time to time by clairvoyants and other so-called seers, scientists have always maintained that this question can only be answered in the negative and that we can hardly expect to obtain more light on the subject than is furnished by Flourens, the statistician, who after years of labor discovered that the average duration of life in Europe is from 36 to 40 years, that the ordinary duration is 65 years and that the abnormal duration is 125 years, says the New York Herald.

Now, however, a German savant insists that, barring accidents, the exact duration of any person's life can be determined by the X rays. This savant is Herr Richter, who is well known by his experiments with these rays, and by his works on radiography, and his novel method of determining the duration of life is fully explained in a paper by him, which was read the other day at the Imperial College of Berlin.

Herr Richter simply claims that an examination of the principal organs of the body by means of the X rays will show the number of years that any person will live. It has long been admitted, as one of the first and indispensable conditions of longevity that such organs as the heart, the lungs, the brain and the digestive apparatus must be sound and vigorous, but Herr Richter goes further than this; he insists that there is a close connection, which practically never varies, between the duration of life and the size, strength and soundness of these organs, and it is on this connection that his theory is entirely based.

As a proof of the truth of his statements he brings forward numerous examples of organs which he has examined, as well as an array of statistics, which are entirely in his favor. At the same time he admits that there are some persons the duration of whose life cannot be determined by the size and vigor of their organs, but he maintains that these are only exceptional cases and do not really invalidate the truth of his theory.

Perhaps the most extraordinary case of this kind was that of an Englishman, who was born in 1483, and who was so puny at birth that the doctors unanimously decided he could not live. His chest, says an old chronicler, was so narrow that he was scarcely able to breathe; he was as thin as a skeleton, and very often his heart ceased to beat. Yet this extraordinary individual lived to be 168 years old, his death occurring in 1651. He actually saw ten kings reign, and so keen was his enjoyment of life that in his one hundredth year he made violent love to an estimable young woman, and was subsequently severely punished because he did not marry her.

A more grave objection to Herr Richter's theory, according to German scientists, is that, however true it may be in itself, it is apt to prove misleading, for the reason that it is of no avail in the case of persons who meet death through accidents and, as statistics show, a large percentage of human beings come to their end each year in this way. It is a well-known fact, too, that many persons who are killed accidentally have always enjoyed vigorous health and seemed destined to live to a good old age. Yet X rays, if used in such cases, would certainly not have told the truth.

First on Land But Not on Sea.

Nobody will quarrel with this verdict, but our greatness is not uniform. Lieut. Howard, of the intelligence office of the navy department, recently compiled the tonnage of the various navies of the world. The figures are as follows:

England	1,824,920
France	765,519
Russia	503,528
United States	413,525
Germany	410,895
Italy	318,125
Japan	264,435

This, however, does not exactly state the case. Ships of the United States are so superior in fighting strength that it is safe to say that this country is third in naval strength among the powers. Still, it is only third, while its own position in the world is unquestionably the first. The result is a demand that the United States shall have a navy equal to its position and reputation.—Saturday Evening Post.

Abandoned Farm Lands in England.

Over a considerable extent of Salisbury plain, which is now used for military maneuvers, quantities of broken flints are to be seen on the short turf. These flints have a tale to tell besides that in which the geologist revels. They show that the land on which they lie was formerly cultivated. Corn once waved over a considerable portion of the great plain. It was abandoned as unprofitable long before the drop in prices 20 or 25 years ago. A statement was recently made in one of the daily papers that two farms in Essex, on the borders of the Epping forest, are to be had rent free, provided the tenant pays all rates, etc., and keeps the farm buildings in proper repair.—London Express.

The famous composer sat in the orchestra chair and listened to the comic opera of his rival. As the chorus roared out a swinging, familiar air, the tears started to the great musician's eyes. "Ah," he said, sadly, "I would not have believed it, but he has stolen a march on me." To those familiar with his works, the truth of this remark would have been apparent.—Princeton Tiger.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 4, 1901.

Probably not within the present century will a President of the United States and his Cabinet be called upon to take part in two such notable events so close together as the funeral of Queen Victoria, which President McKinley and his Cabinet attended Saturday, and Joint Congressional Celebration of the Centennial anniversary of the appointment of John Marshall, of Virginia, to be Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, which they attended in the hall of the House today. Time is precious just now, both with the President and with Congress, but time can never be so precious that some of it cannot be spared to do honor to the memory of so distinguished an American as John Marshall was.

The real fight in the Senate over the Ship Subsidy bill is now on in earnest. The Republican program, arranged by the steering committee, is to keep the subsidy bill before the Senate until it is voted upon, or it is demonstrated that the opposition is determined enough to prevent a vote. Already the Senate is meeting an hour earlier and this week night sessions are to be forced. The friends of the bill are confident that the result will be the passage of the bill.

The long-delayed Army Reorganization Act became a law on Saturday, and the President and Secretary of War are now engaged in carrying out its provisions. It is expected that the nominations of the high-grade officers provided for will be sent to the Senate this week by the President. That General Miles will be made Lieutenant General is regarded as certain.

Senator Stewart, in a speech supporting the Ship Subsidy bill, said he was on principle opposed to any monopoly of the sea, but if there must be a monopoly of the sea he desired it to be American.

Col. William Brown, of New York, a life-long Democrat, who is now visiting Washington, paid this high tribute to President McKinley: "I became well acquainted with McKinley in school, and we have always been good friends. Although we have differed in our political beliefs, I have always admired the man. He is honest and straightforward and from earliest youth has led an exceptionally clean and upright life. Whatever McKinley undertook he did well, and the same trait has characterized his work through life. When he started in to champion a cause, he did it with his whole soul, and I believe he never does or says a thing that is not prompted by the highest motives of conscience."

General B. Tracy, whose good work as Secretary of the Navy, under the Harrison administration, had no little to do with the present efficiency of our Navy, is in Washington on legal business. He said: "We have the best ships and the best guns and the best fighting men of any navy in the world, and in the development of our Navy should be centered the patriotic pride of every American. I have noted with pleasure the great progress that has been made toward even a greater navy, and I hope the government will continue the good work. America can afford to have nothing less than the best."

Senator Chandler raised a laugh by saying, in reply to the claim of Senator Jones that the opponents of the Ship Subsidy bill wanted time enough to expose its iniquity: "The opponents of the bill have been allowed to expose the iniquity of the bill and their own iniquity along with it."

Senator Spooner, who will retire March 4th, makes a positive denial of the story that he will succeed Attorney General Griggs in President McKinley's Cabinet. He says he expects to practice law. He ought to know.

Senator Hanna is inclined to joke about his rheumatism, which is again giving him trouble. As Senator Morgan stepped aside to allow Mr. Hanna to pass through a door, he said, nodding at the lame foot: "Same old trouble, I suppose?" "Yes," replied Senator Hanna: "Same old rheumatism. It seems to be getting a little worse every day. I guess it is politics struck in."

The difficulty of pleasing those who refuse to be pleased is once more exemplified by the present attitude of those who have all along been criticising the President for usurping the power properly belonging to Congress, in his insular policy, toward the President's desire that Congress shall pass upon the satisfactoriness of the Cuban government that will be provided for by the Constitution now being formulated by the convention sitting in Havana. President McKinley holds, and very properly, that Congress should pass upon this matter before our military authority is withdrawn from Cuba, and his critics, seemingly just to be contrary, are contending that he should assume the responsibility of deciding the matter; but their contention will make no difference in the determination of President McKinley to submit the matter to Congress, and to ask Congress to act upon it. It is not likely that the Cuban Constitution will be ready in time to be submitted to the present session of Congress, and that is one of the reasons why the opinion that an extra session of Congress will be absolutely necessary regardless of what this session may do or leave undone, is increasing every day in Washington.

VOLUME 24. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1901. NUMBER 49.

WHY THE LAW IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

Authorities Show That Voters' Rights Cannot Be Abridged.

ACTION IN OTHER STATES.

Senator McComas Discusses the Question of the Proposed Disfranchisement Act in an Able and Convincing Manner.

Senator McComas has given a legal opinion upon the proposed act to disfranchise illiterate voters.

Pryor to his election to the United States Senate Mr. McComas was one of the justices of the Supreme Bench of the District of Columbia and his views are, therefore, entitled to the most careful consideration.

The Senator's opinion is:

"Governor Smith should be better advised before he yields to this pernicious scheme to disfranchise illiterates by an act of assembly.

"The leaders of the New York bar in April, 1894, sent an opinion to Gov. Roswell P. Flower, who transmitted it to the legislature then in session. This opinion was signed by James C. Carter, George Bliss, W. B. Hornblower, Hugh D. Cole, Francis L. Stetson, John F. Dillon, John E. Parsons, William H. Peckham, Elihu Root and Joseph Choate. (First Foster on Constitution, 237.)

"This is their first proposition: 'Any duly qualified elector has a right to vote for any competent person to fill an office for which a person is to be elected at the election at which he desires to vote, whether or not such person for whom he desires to vote has been so nominated that his name is printed upon the official ballot. Any ballot act which does not afford all voters, whether illiterate or not, an opportunity and reasonable facilities for voting for such a person is unconstitutional.'

"The constitutions of New York and Maryland agree in every material point in defining the qualifications of a voter. The leading members of our Maryland bar would do good service if they would unite in an opinion upon the constitutionality of a ballot law directly or indirectly disfranchising illiterates.

"I am confident such lawyers would agree that every ballot law must contain due protection for the rights of all voters qualified by the state constitution and that a law would be unconstitutional which prevented from the expression of his choice a voter who, through physical disability or lack of education, was unable intelligently to select or mark his ballot.

"In Massachusetts the people adopted a constitutional amendment providing that 'no person shall have the right to vote who shall not be able to read the constitution in English language and write his name.' This amendment exempted those who are physically disabled. It did not apply to 'any person who has now the right to vote.' It disfranchised no voter. The object of the Southern legislation in every case is to disfranchise voters.

"In each of the Southern states which have disfranchised illiterates the legislatures were nearly or quite unanimous in favor of such disfranchisement. The constitutional qualifications of a voter were nearly like the Maryland constitution. It would have been easy to disfranchise voters by an act of the legislature, yet in each case the Legislature of Mississippi, Louisiana and South Carolina called a constitutional convention and by an amendment proceeded to disfranchise certain illiterates.

"A Democratic legislature in North Carolina had a large majority elected to contrive a law to disfranchise certain illiterates. Even that legislature did not venture to disfranchise illiterates by its own act, but submitted a constitutional amendment to the people to disfranchise this class. They knew that in the Van Bokkelen case (73 N. C. Report, 198) their supreme court had declared that the General Assembly cannot in any way change the qualifications of voters, that it is the effect of the act and not the intention of the Legislature which renders it void.

"It appears the majority party in Virginia are striving like democratic politicians in Maryland to disfranchise illiterates, but the Virginia legislators are aware it will require a constitutional amendment to effect it. They know their object cannot be secured by an act of assembly, and their Legislature now in session proposes not to pass an act of assembly, but to submit a constitutional amendment to disfranchise their illiterates.

"In Daggett vs. Hudson, 43 Ohio State 561, it was said: 'The legislature has full power to regulate the right to vote, but no constitutional power to restrain or abridge the right or unnecessarily to impede its free exercise. Under the pretense of regulation the right of suffrage must be left untrammeled by any provisions or even rules of evidence that may injuriously or necessarily impair it.' The court held the act of assembly unconstitutional.

"So also in Pennsylvania in Page vs. Allen, 58 Pa. St. 338, a registry law was declared unconstitutional on the ground that it impaired the free exercise of the right of suffrage as conferred by the constitution, and that no constitutional qualification of an elector can in the least be abridged, added to or altered by legislation or the pretense of legislation.

"The true line between laws which take away or abridge the right of suffrage and those which lawfully regulate its exercise is defined by the Massachusetts court in Capen vs. Foster, 12 Pickering, 488. It is added: 'Such construction would afford no warrant for such an exercise of legislative power as, under the pretense and color of regulating, should subvert or injuriously restrain the right itself.'

"In Monroe vs. Collins, 17 Ohio, 686, the court said: 'What the Legislature cannot do directly it cannot do by indirection. If it has no power expressly to deny or take away the right, it has none to define it away or unreasonably abridge or impede its enjoyment by laws professing to be merely remedial.'

"In Southerland vs. Norris, 74 Maryland, 328, Chief Justice McSherry, in discussing the registry act, recites the qualifications of a voter as prescribed by the first section of the first article of our Maryland constitution, and further says: 'These qualifications fixed by the organic law can neither be enlarged nor curtailed by the General Assembly.

"The principle is well expressed by Justice Strong, who later became an eminent justice of the Supreme Court, in McCafferty vs. Guyer, 59 Pa. St. 111: 'Can the Legislature take away from the elector his right to vote while he possesses all the qualifications required by the constitution? If so, the legislative power is superior to the organic law of the state, and the Legislature, instead of being controlled by it, may mold the constitution at its pleasure. Such is not the law. A right conferred by the constitution is beyond the reach of legislative interference.'

"I need not catalogue the many cases in the state courts which hold that the state legislature cannot add to the constitutional qualifications of a voter, but an act of the legislature which directly or indirectly deprives a person of the right to vote, although he has every qualification which the constitution makes necessary, is void.

"I have a great respect for our Court of Appeals, and believe it would so again declare. Can it be true that under the cloak of an unconstitutional statute there is concealed the desperate purpose to destroy our fair election law? Can it be that cunning men mean to pass an unconstitutional statute to disfranchise illiterates and incorporate a shamful provision like the Virginia constable, assistant to illiterates, or like the infamous Dortch law in Tennesee? Can it be that our Maryland electors will thus surrender the window by a provision which may be constitutional, but surely is corrupt, which puts an end to fair elections? Can it be the purpose of desperate poilticians to insert the grandfather's clause to disfranchise only the colored people? 'If so, I am confident the latter will raise a Federal question.

"In Williams vs. Mississippi, 170, U. S. 225, the Supreme Court said of the constitution of Mississippi and its suffrage statutes: 'They do not on their face discriminate between the races and it has not been shown that their actual administration was evil, only that evil was possible under them.'

"The Supreme Court also said in the same case: 'Though the law itself be fair on its face and impartial in appearence, yet, if it be applied and administered by public authority with an evil eye and unequal hand so as practically to make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances material to their rights, the denial of legal justice is still within the prohibition of the constitution.'

"Cases will soon be carried up from the several states which have disfranchised the colored voters by evasive ballot laws, indirectly robbing them of their constitutional suffrage. I have confidence that the Supreme Court will declare these constitutional amendments in these several states null and void because of the prohibitions of the 15th amendment.

"If the effort were made fairly to confine suffrage to illiterates and be made in the careful plan adopted by Massachusetts I would not oppose it. Massachusetts did not disfranchise a single voter. It provided a literate electorate for the future. It required the future voter to read the constitution in English and to write his own name. It required that this provision should not apply to persons under physical disability, 'nor to any person who now has the right to vote, nor to any person 60 years old or upward at the time the constitutional amendment should take effect.

"Let such a constitutional amendment be presented to the next Legislature at its regular session, above all preserving our bipartisan registry and ballot law, fixing a time in the future when new voters should be required to read and write, securing the suffrage to those who now vote, saving the suffrage to old illiterates, white workingmen as well as colored men who may settle in our state. In a word, propose the Massachusetts constitutional amendment at a regular session of the Legislature, carry it by a vote of three fifths of the members of each house and submit it to the people. I feel confident the body of the Republican party would accept the amendment which deprived no voter of his vested right to vote, which required all new voters except aged workingmen to know how to read and write and kept the bipartisan election judges of illiteracy. Such is the Massachusetts system.

"The Mississippi plan has taught us that such a test of illiteracy requires the present bipartisan registry and ballot law we now have.

"Should the machine control the window in Maryland on the Mississippi plan our elections, now the fairest in the Union, would be farcical and fraudulent, and be more fraudulent than they were before the success of the Republicans and of the reform movement six years ago."

Pneumonia Can be Prevented.

This disease always results from a cold or an attack of the grip and may be prevented by the timely use of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. That remedy was extensively used during the epidemics of La Grippe of the past few years, and not a single case has ever been reported that did not recover or that resulted in pneumonia, which shows it to be a certain preventive of that dangerous disease. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy has gained a world wide reputation for its cures of colds and grip. For sale by all druggists.

Farming With An Elephant.

James Cahill, of Roney's Point, is the only person in West Virginia and probably in the United States who has in regular use upon his farm an elephant which is used for farm work. With the swaying beast hitched up to a plow he can turn more ground than any of his neighbors with a team of horses, and when it comes to hauling logs the elephant will walk away with ease with logs which the best teams of his neighbors cannot move. The elephant eats little more than a horse and does many times the work of one, is gentle and docile and little trouble, and Mr. Cahill is more than pleased with his experiment. Several months ago a small circus broke up at Martin's Ferry and its property was sold at auction. Mr. Cahill, who was at the sale, bid in a few donkeys, the elephant and a tent, and took them home, expecting to start a small show himself. His father, a frugal Irishman, decided that a beast the size of an elephant could not remain on the farm and be fed unless it paid for its board with labor, so he harnessed it up and the animal worked nicely. He did so well that they have given up the idea of starting a circus and will keep the elephant on the farm.

Want to Quit West Virginia.

In view of the fact that most of the municipal measures submitted to the West Virginia Legislature for the relief of towns in the Panhandle, and particularly in Wheeling, have been defeated, citizens have revived the old scheme for annexation to Pennsylvania. The Panhandle people say that they pay two-thirds of the State's taxes, yet every legislature expresses the utmost disregard of their wishes. The State is divided in sentiment. Several years ago matters became so strained that the Wheeling and Ohio county authorities appointed a commission to look into the possibility of securing annexation to Pennsylvania to which they say they are bound industrially and commercially.

SUB-CELLAR MOONSHINE.

Revenue Officers Find a Remarkable Distillery Near Rockwood.

Revenue officers raided one of the most unique stills ever discovered in the Allegheny mountains three miles from Rockwood, Pa., a few nights ago. This makes the fourth still captured in that vicinity within a few weeks. It was operated by David Pletcher.

W. J. Dixon, United States deputy collector; Dr. David Gilder, of Rockwood, and Nelson Mossboro, of Listie's mines, went to the home of Pletcher. No sign of a still could be found on the first or second stories of the house. In the cellar the floor was of wood and this proved to be a false covering. Under it was a complete distillery for the making of moonshine whiskey. The furnace was modern. The still was large and complete, with a long worm, whose coils were constantly drenched by water from a Mountain spring, gushing out into the grotto. Sections of stove pipe conveyed the smoke from this furnace to the chimney of Pletcher's house to avoid suspicion.

From the underground still three was a long passage, four feet wide, leading through the mountain side to a huge boulder, where there was a hidden exit. This afforded Pletcher a means of escape should the house be surrounded by revenue officers. In the attack of the house the officers found 10 gallons of moonshine whiskey, 90 proof. This the officers took with them. Dickson, having undertaken the journey on quick notice, was unprepared with the proper papers, and could not arrest Pletcher, who was at his home. Pletcher worked at J. B. Sweitzer's Somerset distillery in the day and operated his own still in the night. For two years the still, it is thought, has been in operation, as Pletcher was seen digging the tunnel that long ago, when he said it was for better drainage of his cellar. Pletcher has been supplying all the towns in the vicinity of Rockwood, it is claimed.

You're It.

If you're sore
To the core,
With aching bones,
And husky tones
When you speak,
And you're weak
In the knees.
And you sneeze,
And often cough
Your head near off;
And you note
That your throat
Feels quite raw,
And your jaw
Feels as if You'd got a biff,
And dull pains
Vex your brains,
Then you've caught it.
You have got it—
It's the grip.

If you feel
The heat steal
O'er your frame
Like a flame,
Till you burn
And you yearn
For chunks of ice
At any price,
Then like a flash
From head to feet,
A chill complete,
And you shake
And you quake,
And there's desire
For a fire
And something hot
Right on the spot
To quickly drink,
And you think
Right there and then
You'll ne'er be warm again,
Then you've caught it,
You have got it—
It's the grip.

It's in the air.
It's everywhere;
The microbe of the grip
It's on another trip,
And up and down,
Through all the town.
By night and day
It seeks its prey,
And it's the fad
And you are sad,
Or even mad,
Or if you sneeze,
Or cough or wheeze,
Or feel too warm,
Or chills alarm,
To wear a look of grim dismay
And hoarsely say:
"I've caught it,
I've got it—
It's the grip."

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 11, 1901.

Senator Spooner has offered an amendment to the Army Appropriation bill, embodying the views of the Republican Senators and meeting President McKinley's wishes as to legislation providing civil government for the Philippines. It is short but comprehensive, giving the President authority—"for the establishment of civil government and for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of said islands in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property and religion; provided that all franchises granted under authority hereof shall contain a reservation of the right to alter, amend or repeal the same." If the Democrats do not filibuster to prevent this amendment will be adopted. An amendment to the same bill is now being prepared by Republican Senators, naming the conditions under which the President will be authorized to withdraw our military authority from Cuba, and will be submitted this week. It is believed by Republican Senators that if these two amendments can be put through the necessity for an extra session of the next Congress will be obviated, as the last named will tell the Cubans exactly what they must do to get our troops withdrawn, thus meeting the President's wishes that Congress should name the conditions.

It is a little difficult to say whether the attempt to force a vote on the Ship Subsidy bill, by holding night sessions last week, improved the chances of the measure or not. Its supporters still express confidence that it will be passed at this session, and it is known that negotiations are going on looking to an agreement to set a time to take a vote, but its opponents are still outwardly putting up a stubborn opposition. The real trouble seems to be that some of the Republican Senators decline to consider the bill a party measure. They are not opposing it, and if the bill is voted upon they will probably vote for it, but they are not actively trying to get it to a vote, and to that extent are playing into the hands of its opponents. There is considerable talk of the River and Harbor bill being used as a club to force the opponents of the shipping bill to allow it to be voted upon. It cannot be positively stated that this will be done, but it is a fact that the River and Harbor bill has not been reported to the Senate, and when Senator McMillan, chairman of the Commerce Committee, which has charge of it, was asked when it would be reported, he replied: "Wait until the Ship Subsidy bill is out of the way and I will tell you more about it." Another Senator expressed the opinion that if the shipping bill failed the River and Harbor bill would either fail or be cut in half.

The State Department will take no action on the private letter written by the Chinese minister, criticising Gen. Otis, for having applied the Chinese exclusion laws of the United States to the Philippines, the Minister having voluntarily called at the Department and explained that the letter was not written for publication, and that he meant no discourtesy either to Gen. Otis or this government. He also called attention to the fact that he had publicly protested, under instructions from his government against the application of the Chinese exclusion law to the Philippines at the time it was done. It is fortunate for the Chinese Minister that he is personally popular with the officials of this government. Had he been otherwise, the Otis letter would probably have gotten him his walking papers.

Senator Thurston has again stated that under no circumstances will he allow his name to be used to break the dead-lock in the Nebraska legislature. He says it is absolutely necessary for him to resume his law practice and make some money, and that he could not be induced to remain in the Senate six years longer.

There is quite a tangle in the House over the Senate amendments to the Revenue Reduction bill, and there is a possibility that it may result in the failure of the bill at this session.

Senator Chandler declares that his resolution providing for the meeting of the Fifty-Seventh Congress on the second Monday in March, 1901, and for the meeting of each future Congress on the second Monday in the March following the election of its representatives, was not intended as a joke, but was meant very seriously, and to meet a state of affairs which exists at the closing or short session of every Congress. Mr. Chandler thinks it is wrong to try to crowd a lot of important general legislation besides the regular appropriation bills, into a short session, and that it would be much better to always leave the general legislation for the new Congress, provided the new Congress assembled immediately after the close of the old.

Senator Lodge probably came very near to voicing the opinion of President McKinley, when he said: "Before the United States can give its approval to any Constitution, or its recognition to any independent Cuban government, it must be assured that there is no responsibility of any assumption of any Cuban debts incurred by Spain. We also have the right to ask for proper guarantees in regard to relations of Cuba with other powers and as to places for Naval stations necessary to the United States." President McKinley said to a party of Senators: "Just as soon as the Cubans are ready to attend to their own affairs, we must turn their government over to them."

EDUCATIONAL.

School Libraries.

The following paper upon the subject of school libraries was read at the recent teachers' institute held in Oakland by Miss Clara Englehart, of Accident:

It is important that every school should have a library. But in this county of ours we are not so fortunate to possess a library in every school, and in fact there are few schools that do possess libraries.

But we will first notice the uses of a library and what it should contain. Scholars will read, there is no doubt about that, and it should be the duty of the teacher to direct their reading that they may reach and secure that which is good and avoid all that is bad. Many of the stories young people grasp today are marked by profanity; they are indescribly vulgar. The boy reader obtains a theoretical and literary acquaintance with methods of fraud and crime. Some times drunkenness is represented in its disgrace and misery, but generally drinking is represented as jolly and entertaining, and there is no suggestion that boys who act as the boys in these stories do ever have to pay any penalty in after life. Good reading elevates the mind to higher and purer motives of life. I think it well to have the pupils take up biographies of men who have made their mark in life in an honest and industrious way. Pupils will readily take an interest in reading the life of George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, Benjamin Franklin and others who have gone through life successfully. The pupils will see with how much disadvantage those men labored under when they were boys to gain their education, and that it was determination and courage that made them the men of honor and fame. Pupils will see what greater advantages they have than those of years ago, and this should encourage them. And the lives of such men will fill their minds with rich thoughts that will be remembered through life. They will aid them in their journey through life and help them to be honest and industrious and bring prosperity and happiness in this life and greater happiness in the life to come. We should have good literature, such as writings from Longfellow, Whittier, Holmes, Lowell, Hawthorne, Bryant, Cooper, Irving and others.

The principal provinces of a library are biography, travel, historical novels, poetry, literary criticisms, romance, civil government and pedagogies. It is well to have juvenile books of history to instruct and interest the young and reading of fairy stories and fables for the little ones. Leading educators are almost unanimous in their opinion of the value of certain of these stories of this description in the moral training of the little ones. Books of practical instruction relating to the household and simple forms of manual training should belong to the library, such as household economy, sewing primer, etc. We should carefully avoid the trashy literature that floods the country today.

But how can we obtain a library in our schools is the next question that will arise in our minds. We know that this county could not afford to purchase libraries for the schools. It was suggested last year that the teacher could get up an entertainment. He could tell the patrons his purpose and charge an admission fee and make money enough to purchase a small library. A few books are better than none. I don't know how many tried or how many were successful.

In the matter of a school library the true modern teacher will make his influence felt. He will leave his impression upon the community by aiding to secure wholesome literature for the pupils and encouraging in them habits of systematic reading, the reading "which maketh a full man." If the teacher fails to do this he leaves unperformed one of his most important duties.

THE OTHER'S VIEWS.

I longed to go from where the hills
Loomed blue against the sky,
And gaze upon the spreading sea
And watch the ships go by;
I longed to stand while others still
Were fast in blissful sleep
And see the sun's first crimson glow
Spread out across the deep.

And while in wonderment I gazed
Out on the purple sea
Another glanced across the waves
And turned and spoke to me:
"Oh, that I might behold the hills,
The gray old hills that rise
Like monuments to God and lose
Their summits in the skies!"

You count the treasures that you have
And sigh and turn away,
And envy some one else who seems
So amply blessed to-day—
And yet his heart may ache and he May have his longings, too—
May count your blessings and his own
And watch and envy you!

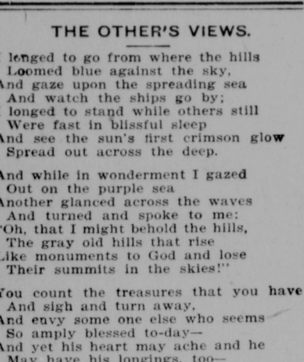
"LITTLE BAT" and the Sibley Fight

"THE long-haired man from the west may be all right, but there are others," remarked a dark, swarthy, stout man in Chicago, the other day. He was Frank Grouard, ex-chief of scouts of the United States army, the hero of a hundred Indian fights and hairbreadth escapes. There is nothing romantic in the appearance of this big, brawny man, his black hair now well streaked with silver, but his exploits are liberally blazoned on the army reports of Crook and Sheridan. Born on an island in the south Pacific in 1850, the son of a missionary, through stress of circumstances at the age of five he was left to shift for himself. Doing chores about the California mining camps and driving an ore wagon was his training for carrying mail over a lonely star route. He was captured as a youth by Indians and adopted as a son of the famous Sioux chief Crazy Horse, living five years in Indian camps, eating his meat without salt, and forgetting the taste of bread, and intrusted with the mysteries of "medicine-making" by Sitting Bull. This school innured him to hardship and eventually led him to meet and overcome dangers that few men have experienced.

When he saw the telegram in the newspaper the other day relating to the tragedy at Crawford, Neb., that sounded "taps" for Baptiste Gaunier, better known as the famous scout,



BOTH INDIANS WENT DOWN TOGETHER

Little Bat, he quite forgot the overhanging wonder of the elevated road and the tall buildings to tell his regret at the passing of one who had shared with him many perils. "Did you ever hear of the Sibley fight?" he asked. "If you have not, John Finerty can tell you one lively side of it. Little Bat might have told you some more about it, and I might say something myself. Yes, we were all in it up to our chins, and as an all-around close shave I think all accounts agree that it was about the limit. The idea of a man living on a diet of that kind and then getting killed in a saloon fight! It seems tough. Poor Little Bat! Bad whisky was worse 'medicine' than Sitting Bull ever made in all his years of deviltry.

"But you want me to tell about the Sibley fight, do you? It was about 24 years ago last July, just about a week before the battle that wiped out Gen. Custer and his entire command. Gen. Crook assigned Little Bat and myself to go north on the Tongue river and meet a body of friendly Crows that were joining us to fight against the Sioux. Much to my regret, Lieut. F. W. Sibley and 24 picked men of the Second cavalry were detailed as an escort. The men were splendid fellows, but all more or less new in Indian fighting. We had been moving north two days when in the dawn of the third morning I discovered the Sioux moving toward Tongue river thicker than buffalo in the valley of the Platte. I called Bat softly and when he saw the great painted procession stealing over the plains he said: 'My God! We are gone!'

"I waited until I saw them strike our trail. Immediately the discoverer began circling his horse and waving his blanket, and about 20 minutes later every Indian in that section knew that white men were somewhere about. I thought we might possibly get away from them by getting up into the mountains. I told Bat to follow me with the men as fast as he could, my idea being to get beyond where the Twin creek trail crossed our own in the mountains, knowing that the Indians would naturally make a run to cut us off at that point. I suppose I went up the hills rather fast, for at length I got tired waiting at the trail crossing and went back for the soldiers. Imagine my surprise when I learned that the party had stopped to make coffee. Lieut. Sibley admitted his inexperience in a running fight and had yielded to the importunings of his men, who wanted breakfast. I told him the chances were that none of us would eat any more between that time and kingdom come, as the Indians were probably waiting for us at the point we should have passed long ago. I made a wide detour from the trail as we toiled up the mountain—very fortunately, for they were ambushed for us at the crossing of the trails between two high tree-crowned buttes. If we hard passed through that natural gate none of us would have been left to tell about it. As we passed up the mountain to the left they got on to our curves, and about 200 did some wild target practice in our direction. Strange to say, not a man was hit. Correspondent John Finerty's horse was shot, and he came up and joined me in leading the line. The horses were inclined to stampede at the first fire, so at the beginning of the thick timber I ordered the stock tied in a bunch. The Indians tried in every way to draw our fire, but Sibley, at my suggestion, ordered no firing unless they charged right up to us, which is not the way an Indian fights.

"We got to the timber at ten o'clock in the morning, and we did not fire a shot until three o'clock in the afternoon. Every man had his tree, and he stuck to it closer than a brother. Early in the day a leather-lunged Sioux yelled at me that he knew Bat and myself were there, and they were going to have great fun with us—particularly me. I knew what that meant without a map, so I told every soldier to save a good cartridge for himself before surrendering to the fiendish tortures, for the Sioux have very original methods of making a man die by the most painful process possible.

"Along about the middle of the afternoon my red friends who were waiting to entertain me began to get very gay and were growing bolder every minute. They had killed all our horses but five, and thought it was impossible for us to get away; in fact, I heard them say so quite frequently in the gutteral language of the Cheyennes. White Antelope and a band of Cheyennes had joined the war party, and this chief began riding closer and closer to our trees. Finally he and another chief, who was riding about five yards behind him, came into fairly good range. I could see the color of his eyes as he came toward me. I pulled the trigger of my rifle and both Indians went down together as a result of the single shot. It was the first shot from our party, and the double tragedy confused the Indians. Then our whole outfit poured in a withering volley, and I told Sibley it was our time to take advantage of their confusion and get through their line back to the gully. I waited until they were all fairly started back through the heavy timber, then, taking the lariat from the saddle of my dead horse, I followed.

"It was a mile from where we made our stand to the main fork of the Tongue river, and the woods were full of terrible windfalls and it was awfully hard traveling. The first 200 yards the men had to simply squirm their way through the timber and keep very low. The savages had a comparatively thin line at our rear, as they knew the character of the country and thought we would be helpless without our horses.

"When I rejoined the men I sent Bat in the lead and I covered the rear. The soldiers took off their boots and stepped from rock to rock in order to leave our trail as blind as possible. About dark a heavy rainstorm, with much wind, came up and soon drowned out the firing that our foes kept up on our camp. Our policy of holding our fire so fooled them that they did not rush our camp until the following morning, a fact that I learned later. The storm was wild and terrible, we were drenched and the timber began to fall all about us. We kept in a territory where horses could not travel, for reasons of our own, and we hit an unblazed trail over the mountains for the following 45 hours without a mouthful to eat. Sometimes the squirrel path was so steep that Bat and I had to pull the soldiers up over the rocks with our lassoes.

"The following morning at three o'clock we forded Goose creek, the cold water coming up to our armpits, and at daylight fell in with a scouting party of the Second cavalry. Then we went back over the trail and picked up two of our exhausted soldiers that had given up. We had been under a hot fire nearly ten hours, had traveled 50 miles over a terribly rough mountain country, and during all that time had not enjoyed the luxury of a ration, as we were forced to abandon everything when the Indians sighted us, except our hope and our ammunition. Yet we never lost a man.

"Poor little Bat! He was in the lead. Just to think of it! Now he is snuffed out as the result of a cowardly misdeal in a miserable saloon fight."

The speaker cast aside the stump of his cigar and said: "Where do you think I could find John Finerty, anyway?"—Chicago Daily Record.

Her Way.

A Glasgow servant girl went home a few evenings ago with her head wrapped up in a shawl.

Her young mistress asked her what ailed her, and was told that she was suffering from a bad attack of toothache, brought on by sitting in the park.

"But you ought not to sit on such a cold, chilly night as this," said the mistress. "You should walk at a smart pace."

The girl looked at her a minute, as though pitying her ignorance, and then answered:

"You canna coort right walking; you must sit down."—London Spare Moments.

WHEN THOMAS TAKES HIS PEN.

Young Thomas Jones came home from school with sad and solemn air;
He did not kiss his mother's cheek nor pull his sister's hair;
He hungered not for apples, and he spoke in dismal tones;
'Twas very clear misfortune drear had happened Thomas Jones.

"My precious child," his mother cried,
"what, what is troubling you?
You're hurt—you're ill—you've failed in school! Oh, tell us what to do!"
Then Thomas Jones made answer in a dull, despairing way:
"I've got to write an essay on 'The Indian To-day.'"

His tallest sister ran to him, compassion in her eye;
His smallest sister pitied him—nor knew the reason why;
And all that happy family forsook its work and play
To hunt up information on "The Indian
To-day."

They read of Hiawatha and of sad Ramona's woe—
You found encyclopedias where'er they chanced to go.
They bought a set of Cooper, and they searched it through and through,
While Thomas Jones sat mournfully and told them what to do.

For three whole days the library was like a moving van.
"Is Mr. Jones," each caller asked, "a literary man?"
And day by day more pitiful became young Thomas' plight,
Because, alas! the more he read, the more he could not write.

"Write what you know," his mother begged (she stirred not from his side).
"I do not know one single thing!" that wretched child replied.
"Oh, help me, won't you? Don't you care?" Then, when assistance came:
"Don't tell me—don't! It isn't fair!" he pleaded just the same.

The night before the fateful day was quite the worst of all.
Black care upon the house of Jones descended like a pall.
All pleasure paled, all comfort failed, and laughter seemed a sin;
For "Oh, to-morrow," Thomas wailed,
"it must be handed in!"

When, lo! the voice of Great-aunt Jones came sternly through the door:
"I cannot stand this state of things one single minute more!
The training of a fractious child is plainly not my mission;
But—Thomas Jones, go straigh upstairs and write that composition!"

And Thomas Jones went straight upstairs, and sat him down alone,
And—though I grant a stranger thing was surely never known—
In two short hours he returned serenely to display
Six neatly-written pages on "The Indian
To-day!"

His teacher read them to the class, and smiled a well-pleased smile;
She praised the simple language and the calmly flowing style;
"For while," she said, "he does not rise to any lofty height,
'Tis wonderful how easily young Thomas
Jones can write."
—Elsie Hill, in St. Nicholas.

NICE LITTLE GAME.

It Is Called Nine Men Morris and Can Be Played by Two on a Simple Board.

This interesting little game is played by two persons on a board marked with the diagram shown, and buttons, beans or grains of corn of two colors may be used as men. Each player has nine pieces, none of which are on the board at the opening of the game.

The players take turns in placing their men, one at a time, at the points where the lines meet each other, and after all have been put on in moving them from one spot to the next in any direction along the lines. Each player's object, both in placing the men and moving them, is to form a row of three of his own pieces, and whenever this is done he may take from the board one of the opponent's pieces, but he must not disturb a row of three if there is any other that he can take. He who takes off all the hostile pieces wins. Sometimes when a player has lost all his men but three he is allowed to "hop," that is, to play a man to any vacant spot on the board. The player must avoid crowding his men together and try to place them on or near the corners of the board, at the same time trying to block his opponent as well as to get his own men into line. When possible it should be arranged to make more than one line in successive moves when by moving one man backward and forward two lines can alternately be made and broken.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

No Deceit About This.

"You told me," said the infuriated purchaser, "that that brook on the farm you sold me never ran dry."

"Guess I did," said the real estate man.

"It has been dry all summer."

"When it was dry it didn't run, did it? Therefore, it could not run dry. We never deceive." — Philadelphia Press.

MR. REYNARD AT HOME.

Watching Young Foxes at Play in the Woods Is a Truly Fascinating Sight.

The chance to watch young foxes at play in the woods—and there are few sights more fascinating—is not so difficult a thing as one would suppose, says St. Nicholas. This spring I found two dens within a mile of a city of 20,000 people; and it is safe to say that within easy walking distance of every New England town one or more pairs of foxes build their den and raise their little ones every year.

The best way to find a den is to ask the hunters first, then the farmers' boys. Every den has a main entrance, with all the earth from excavation scattered about its front door. That is to mislead you; the foxes seldom use it. And sometimes, indeed, it is closed altogether six feet underground. Ten feet away, hidden behind gray rocks or in a thicket, are other entrances, one for daily use, and one for danger generally. The hole is larger than that made by skunk or woodchuck, and a fox's workmanship is always neater than theirs.

There are three ways of telling whether there are any foxes at home.

First, examine the soft earth about the entrance carefully. Tracks like a small dog's, but narrower in proportion, and more dainty. That's suspicious.

Second, examine the sides of the hole sharply. Here, clinging to a point of rock, is a long yellowish hair, which is crinkled in the middle; and there, trailing from a root-fiber, is another. There was a fox in here once.

Third, put your nose down deep into the hole and take a whiff. Waugh! a nauseating odor, strong and rank, the unmistakable odor of carnivorous youngsters. Now you are sure there are foxes there. You can come almost any bright morning or afternoon and watch them from a distance playing like kittens.

THE BUSY LITTLE BEE.

A Peep at the Wonders of a Hive Cannot Fail to Arouse Astonishment and Admiration.

The whole atmosphere of the hive in the summer is one of bustle and hurry. The workers hustle day and night, and work so hard that when honey is plentiful in the flowers the average life of the working bee is rarely over six weeks. It is safe to say that not one in 5,000 bees lives to eat the honey it has toiled so hard to lay up for the winter. There are usually about 30,000 bees in a colony or hive, and they will average in a good season something like 57 pounds.

It takes 40,000 bees, working one entire day, to gather a single pound of honey, and to get the sweets they must rummage 3,500,000 clover blooms. Now when we know that 75,000,000 pounds of honey are yearly produced in the United States, it becomes a very nice problem to calculate how many bees there are working, say, eight hours a day.

The bee brings four substances into the hive and creates one substance there. The honey is brought in in a little sac and stored in one of the cells of the comb. If you'll notice you'll find the cells slant a little bit, so that the sweet stuff will not spill till the cell is full and can be sealed up. This raw honey has to be stirred and mixed with formic acid, which the bees' jaws secrete, and frequently moved from one cell to another, so as to hasten its evaporation and thickening. Then there is pollen dust from the flowers, which is used to feed the young bee babies, and is also used for capping over their cells, as it is porous to the air and is much cheaper than wax. Then propolis, or bee glue, is fetched from the willow, poplar, cottonwood and balm-gilead trees, and is used to cement cracks and crevices about the hive. Last of all, water is brought into the hive to give drink to the babies.

But more precious than honey is wax, which is really a tallow and not wax. It costs 20 pounds of honey and a long time to make one pound of wax. The bees eat the honey and then hang quietly in a cluster, waiting for the wax to form. It is secreted under the little scales on the abdomen and is used immediately. This wax is not made unless it is actually required, and never as long as there are any vacant combs.

It is the desire to economize in wax that makes the bee store its honey in six-sided cells, for when one cell is built there is one side furnished for six new cells.—Golden Days.

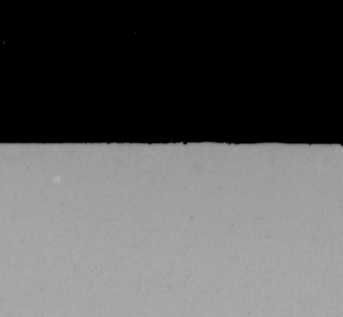
EPIDEMIC OF GRIP WORST EVER KNOWN.

GRIP BACILLUS EVERYWHERE—IN THE AIR WE BREATHE, IN THE WATER WE DRINK, IN THE FOOD WE EAT.

Bacillus of Grip.



Magnified 16,000 times.

Hundreds of car loads of Peruna are shipped in all directions to meet the extraordinary demand of the grip epidemic.

Everybody laying in a stock of this valuable remedy in time to meet the terrible enemy, the Grip.

The extensive facilities of the manufacturers taxed to their utmost to meet the urgent demand for Peruna.

Almost everybody has the grip. Almost everybody must have Peruna.

Taken at the appearance of the first symptoms of the grip, not only is Peruna a prompt cure for the grip but it prevents those disastrous after-effects so characteristic of this dread disease.

Peruna not only cures the grip but prevents it.

Taken in time thousands of lives will be saved in this present epidemic.

Every family should take the precaution to secure a supply of Peruna at once, for the retail and wholesale stock of the remedy may be exhausted by the enormous demand for it.

It is wisdom to have Peruna in the house even before the grip attacks the household.

It has been ascertained by a reporter that the following people of national reputation have given public endorsement and testimonials to Peruna as a remedy for la grippe:

Congressman Howard, of Alabama, says: "I have taken Peruna for the grip and recommend it as an excellent remedy to all fellow-sufferers."

Congressman White, of North Carolina, says: "I find Peruna to be an excellent remedy for the grip. I have used it in my family and they all join me in recommending it."

Miss Frances M. Anderson, of Washington, D. C., daughter of Judge Anderson, of Virginia, says: "I was taken very ill with the grip. I took Peruna and was able to leave my bed in a week."

Mrs. Harriette A. S. Marsh, President of the Woman's Benevolent Association, of Chicago, writes: "I suffered with grip seven weeks. Nothing helped me. Tried Peruna and within three weeks I was fully restored. Shall never be without it again."

At the appearance of the first symptoms of grip people should stay indoors and take Peruna in small doses (teaspoonful every hour) until the symptoms disappear. This will prevent a long, disastrous sickness and perhaps fatal results.

SHARES PUBLIC SCHOOLS' HONORS.

Excellent Geographical Exhibit at Paris Largely Due to Union Pacific.

The Passenger Department of the Union Pacific Railway is in receipt of a letter from Superintendent C. G. Pearse inviting it to share in the honors bestowed upon the Omaha public schools at the Paris exposition. As is well known, the Omaha schools were awarded a gold medal for the excellence of the showing made by their methods of teaching geography. The most important part of the exhibit consisted of a set of illustrated publications and maps showing the sources from which geographical material and information are obtained. Superintendent Pearse acknowledges that great credit is due to the Union Pacific Passenger Department, which furnished many of the publications and maps for the Paris exhibit.—Omaha "Bee," Dec. 11th, 1900.

THE DUTY OF MOTHERS.

What suffering frequently results from a mother's ignorance; or more frequently from a mother's neglect to properly instruct her daughter!

Tradition says "woman must suffer," and young women are so taught. There is a little truth and a great deal of exaggeration in this. If a young woman suffers severely she needs treatment, and her mother should see that she gets it.

Many mothers hesitate to take their daughters to a physician for examination; but no mother need hesitate to write freely about her daughter or herself to Mrs. Pinkham and secure the most efficient advice without charge. Mrs. Pinkham's address is Lynn, Mass.

Mrs. August Pfalzgraf, of South Byron, Wis., mother of the young lady whose portrait we here publish, wrote Mrs. Pinkham in January, 1899, saying her daughter had suffered for two years with irregular menstruation—had headache all the time, and pain in her side, feet swell, and was generally miserable. Mrs. Pinkham promptly replied with advice, and under date of March, 1899, the mother writes again that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound cured her daughter of all pains and irregularity.

Nothing in the world equals Mrs. Pinkham's great medicine for regulating woman's peculiar monthly troubles.

BETTER THAN A PLEDGE.

How a Man Who Wanted to Stop Drinking Was Helped Out of a Dilemma.

A Cleveland man tells this pathetic and characteristic story of the late Rev. Dr. John Wesley Brown, the incident occurring while he was rector of Trinity church, in this city. The story was told the narrator by the doctor himself.

One evening a stranger called at the rectory on Superior street, adjoining the church. He was a well-dressed, well-appearing man, but evidently in deep trouble.

"Dr. Brown," he said, "I have come to you for advice and assistance. I am a victim of the drink habit. I have an excellent position—I am cashier for a wealthy corporation—and I know I cannot retain it unless I reform. I want you to draw up a pledge for me—make it as strong as you can, please—and I will sign it, and you will witness it."

Dr. Brown leaned back and looked at the man.

"How long have you been drinking to excess?" he asked.

The man told him it was five or six years; ever since he obtained his present position. He only drank to excess when he was with his friends. He never drank at other times. When he was with his friends he would forget himself and overstep the limit. Sometimes he didn't go on a spree for a whole month, but the attacks were growing more frequent. He seemed to be losing his will power.

"THERE," HE SAID, "READ THAT."

"My friend," said the doctor, "you don't need a pledge. I see in you a victim of good comradeship. You are far from being an ordinary drunkard. If you signed a temperance pledge and broke it—as you undoubtedly would do—it would still further degrade you in your own eyes. I do not advise the pledge."

The man looked dumfounded.

"But what am I to do?" he gasped.

The doctor drew a card from his desk and rapidly wrote a few lines.

"There," he said, "read that."

This is what the man read:

"To my friends: I find I am becoming a victim of the liquor habit. If I do not quit I am sure to lose my position and ruin myself. For God's sake, don't ask me to take a drink with you."

"There," said Dr. Brown, "sign that and I will sign it as a witness. All I ask of you is to show the card when temptation is at your elbow, and if you fall come here and tell me about it. There! Good night."

It was a full month before the man returned, worried and dejected.

"I expected you long before this," said the doctor, as he greeted the stranger. "Tell me about it. Did you show the card?"

"Yes," replied the man. "The first time was the very night after I called on you. A good friend, a railroad man, came into the office and after I had checked up his accounts said:

"'Come, Charlie, let's go over to the Oyster house and have a drink.' Well, sir, I was reaching for my hat when I remembered the card. I took it out and handed it to him. I thought he would never finish reading it. He looked at me and he looked at the card. And then he slowly put his arm down on the counter and said: 'Charlie, I'd sooner cut that hand off than ask you to drink again.' Well, sir, I showed that card several times after that, and every blessed man I showed it to took it seriously. Sometimes they said: 'All right, old boy.' Sometimes they laid it down without a word. And then—it was last night—I forgot about it, and here I am."

"You are doing well," said the doctor. "Have courage and try and make the interval a little longer next time."

It was three months before the man came back. The next time it was six months.

"And now," said the doctor to the narrator, it is nearly two years since his last call, and I have every reason to believe that he will not find it necessary to come to me again. So, you see, I was quite right. It wasn't a pledge that he needed."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

To Save the Natives.

Aggressive efforts are being put forth in Washington by such missionary and reform workers as Bishop Hartzell, Miss Margaret W. Leitch, Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens and Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts to protect native races from the sale of liquor. A bill has been introduced in both houses for suppression of the liquor traffic in any islands of the Pacific

SALOONOLGY.

Some Deductions from a Careful Study of the Saloon Problem by a College Student.

If sociology is the science of social relations why should not a scientific study of the saloon business in all of its relations be called saloonology? But call it what you may—and a saloon under any name does not smell sweet—such a study was carried on by Mr. Royal L. Melendy, who was sent by the faculty of the University of Michigan to reside for six months in the Chicago Commons to learn by careful personal investigation what is the function of the saloon in the social life of man. This investigation forms part of the work carried on by the ethical subcommittee of the committee of 50, a committee which is now studying the liquor problem in all of its aspects, with the intention of making an exhaustive report which shall be impartial and scientific. A partial report of Mr. Melendy's investigations appears in the American Journal of Sociology for November, and a somewhat briefer report is given in the November number of The Commons, published by Prof. Graham Taylor, warden of the Chicago Commons.

The ardent temperance reformer may feel inclined to say: "What need is there of making such an investigation? Why need we send scientifically equipped spies into this unpromising land, this devil-country of saloons, for we know now what is the ruling purpose of the saloon business? Its purpose is evil, and only evil, and that continually. It is to sell various kinds of intoxicating liquor, and intoxicating liquor is the hell out of which has come, to curse mankind, a legion of evils worse than the 'many' which Jesus cast out of the demoniac of Gadeara."

But the matter is not so simple as it appears at the first blush. What is it that makes the saloons of the Seventeenth ward—where Mr. Melendy began his study — so popular? There are in that ward 163 saloons and only a few churches. Say what we may, the saloon is much more popular than the church in the Seventeenth ward, and we should strive to discover what are the elements of their popularity, for we may find in the methods which they use to attract patrons a verification of Christ's saying: "For the sons of this world are for their own generation wiser than the sons of light." No doubt the ruling purpose of the saloon keeper is to sell as many "drinks" as possible, but he tries to cloak that purpose by an attractive garb of social service.

By ministering to the social nature of man the saloon competes with the home, greatly to the detriment of society. It no doubt is true that the average saloon of the Seventeenth ward is a dangerous social competitor to the average home of that ward in light, heat, furniture, games, music, laughter, sprightly conversation and all that appeals to the companionable nature of man; and by the bitter irony of fate every cent that goes to the support of the saloon is a vote against the home and against the wife and mother, who would like to make the home attractive, but how can she do it when so much money of the wage-earners goes to the support of the 163 saloons? The saloons can start out with gorgeous appointments because most of them are fitted up by the great brewing companies, but the little home of the working man has to start in a modest way, and too often, alas! the wife in striving to make it, with small means, the center of social attraction for her husband is "held up" and robbed by the saloon.

Some saloons provide gymnasiums, hand-ball courts, and baths for their patrons. Others have music and vaudeville performances. Many saloons furnish free lunches, and some serve full meals at small cost. Others have "wine rooms" and drinking compartments where women of the worst class resort to find companions in sin. In others, various kinds of gambling games are carried on under the protection of an unreported "tax." The saloon is a place where attractive vices of every feather flock together.

But in the better parts of the city there are "respectable" saloons, some of them palatial in their appointments, where business men resort for a double purpose. Mr. Melendy says: "The head of a department in one of Chicago's largest wholesale houses assures me that certain of their best salesmen sell a large portion of their goods 'over a glass of beer,' in the neighboring saloon." Then there are trade saloons for the men of this or that craft, "family" saloons with "family" entrances, beer gardens with the attractions of music and outdoor sports—all sorts of saloons which appeal in all sorts of ways to all sorts of people.

The cure? Not to speak in this connection of legal repression and moral and spiritual forces, the attractions of the saloon may be fought with a good degree of success by counter attractions. The attractions of the home are first and best. Were our homes all that they should be the saloons would have to close their doors. In a "tug of war" for the possession of men the saloons have little chance against pure and happy homes.

But homes are often handicapped in the way already indicated, and in such cases we should fight the saloons by the establishment of social settlements, like the Chicago Commons—the brightest spot in the Seventeenth ward—by friendly visitors, by summer camps for women and children, by rescue work, by every helpful agency which Christian love can use, that, by all means, we may save some.—Chicago Advance.

The pupils are first instructed in the general principles of the art of serving at table, and when they have mastered the introductory course they are allowed to practice on two ladies and two gentlemen in evening dress who dine at one table. A PLEASING PERSONALITY.

A Charm of Manner That May Be Cultivated with But Little Exertion.

When an aged minister recently resigned his pulpit, there were many expressions of regret from persons not connected with any church. His voice and sympathetic manner had won all hearts. His successor, a more talented man, was not able to attach the people to him, for he lacked the kindly expression of interest and sympathy that gained the former minister an attentive congregation, writes Margaret Merkel, in Housekeeper.

In a little village, one Sunday evening, the people welcomed the "new minister." One of the old members said: "We have not yet been able to replace one of our good members; she was so useful and ever ready to help."

The minister, thinking of a recent death, asked: "When did she die?" The rarely useful woman had died 20 years before, and her place had not yet been filled. She was neither accomplished nor educated, only a sympathetic, good woman, of a charming personality.

A few years ago a beautiful, gifted woman was taken ill. For years she lived and fretted because of disease. Few people called to see her, or evinced the least sympathy, or desire for her recovery. She was talented, beautiful, dressed attractively, and none could speak evil of her; she was a good daughter and sister; but her excellencies seemed as nothing—because of lack of sympathy, self-control and self-forgetfulness. She regained her health, and became a cynic, seeing the world through dark glasses.

I know a young man, a chronic grumbler, who, while he realizes that he possesses one of the most unfortunate of habits, excuses himself by saying that it is his nature to grumble. His mother has fostered this idea, instead of helping him to overcome this tendency. This individual charm or power may be largely acquired, but it is not the work of chance or the growth of a day.

TO GROW THE RUBBER PLANT.

The Secret Is in Always Feeding It Well When Food Is Needed.

Keep the rubber plant clean by giving it a soap bath, writes Eben E. Rexford, in Ladies' Home Journal. Tall plants can be made to branch by cuting off the tops. But young plants growing to the height of three or four feet in one straight stalk will generally be found more satisfactory, as they will have larger, finer foliage than the old branching plants ever have. When growth is taking place use a fertilizer, as its demands on the soil are great, and ordinary soils are not rich enough to supply all its needs. The secret of the successful culture of the rubber plant consists in always feeding it well at the times when a good deal of food is needed—and by this it will be understood that I refer to its period of growth—and never allowing it to become rootbound. Keep the plant always going ahead, and avoid anything that will check its development if you would have a vigorous and healthy specimen. The rubber plant requires a much stronger light than the palm, therefore it is not so well adapted to room decoration in places some distance from the window as the palm is.

A Vegetarian.

Fennel—Well, no; he didn't actually call me a vegetarian, but that is what he meant. He only said I was a beat.—Boston Transcript.

MORE FENCERS THAN EVER.

The Demand for Foils, Masks, Etc., Increasing—Many Women Are Studying the Science.

"Fencing goods," said a dealer in such articles, according to the New York Sun, "are imported, some from France, but the greater part from Germany. The foil, made with a blade 32 inches in length for beginners, regulation length being 34, is made in very great variety as to details and manner of finish, including foils designed especially for women's use. There are two familiar standard kinds of guards for the foil, the figure 8 guard and the bell guard. These mountings are of iron, of steel and of brass, some polished and some nickel plated and sometimes engraved and gilded, the open guards being faced with leather of one kind and another, including elk skin.

"The foil handles are produced in great variety, not only as to shape, but as to the materials used in them. They are covered with leather of various kinds, including shark skin. Some are covered with velvet, some with plush and some with wire. The handles are corded or wire wound, those of the costlier foils with silver or with gold wire. As to the shapes of the handles they are many; teachers of the various schools of fencing might prefer one this shape and another that; and individual fencers have their preferences, and of course men want handles suited to their hands.

"The foil blades are made in lighter and in heavier weights, in various grades and in great variety as to finish, some polished and some blued, and blades are etched, and engraved, and gilded. Foils are sold not only for use in fencing, but for decoration purposes; some of the finest and most handsomely finished foils, variously ornamented, are put to such uses, and such foils are bought for presentation. Foils are of course produced at a great variety of prices. They are sold in pairs.

"Then there are sold rapiers and fencing swords in a variety of styles. There are sold wooden broadswords for beginners in sword exercise; and there are also sold, for fencing practice, and for exercise, singlesticks, or fencing sticks, these being of wood, somewhat shorter and lighter and also cheaper than foils and having basket hilts.

"While the foils and rapiers and swords are imported, almost all of the other fencing goods are made in this country. There are various kinds of fencing masks, including masks for foils, masks for stick and sword practice, and masks for sword and rapier practice, these being severally adapted to their special uses, and made, besides, each in some variety as to details of construction and manner of finish. Then there are of course fencing gloves for men and for women, for use with the foils, and for sword and rapier fencing. Then there are plastrons, made for the protection of the chest while fencing, these being of chamois skin, padded and quilted; and there are made plastrons for women, these being of plush and padded and quilted and made to fit.

"There is a fencing vest and jacket for foil fencing, made of chamois skin, padded and quilted; and there are for foil fencing jackets made of heavy linen. There are for sword or rapier exercise fencing jackets made of heavy duck and padded and quilted; and there are fencing belts and fencing slippers.

"There are more fencers in this country now than ever before, including more women fencers than ever; and the number of fencers is all the time growing. Fencing is of course largely confined to cities and towns, but there are fencers all over the country. We sell fencing goods from New York to San Francisco and from St. Paul to New Orleans."

Freemen for the Slave Coast.

A new century's promise comes for Africa. For the slave coast a party of four young colored men recently started, and they will reach their destination and begin their work practically with the opening of the new century. They have not gone as missionaries; they have not gone as the organizers of some utopian form of government; they have not gone as hunters or explorers.

With ten bushels of cotton seed, with a cotton gin and with a variety of agricultural implements, they have gone as twentieth century advance agents of a new African prosperity. The scheme is not heralded as being one for the advantage of the colored race, although anyone can see what great possibilities lie in it along that line. It is merely announced, without any undue display of confidence, that the venture is being made in order to open a new field for cotton-growing.—Saturday Evening Post.

Skim Milk Used to Make Paper.

One of the most profitable side industries growing out of the manufacture of paper came from the discovery of the fact that casein was vastly better than the glue formerly in use for putting the heavy coating on the fine grades of paper. The discovery was not only a bonanza for the man who made it and for those who backed it, but also for the dairies. The skim milk which is left after the cream has been taken off for butter and other purposes, and was in the nature of mere refuse for the big dairies, is now turned into a source of profit almost as great as that from butter itself from its use in the manufacture of casein for paper coating and sizing.—Scientific American.

Women Laborers in Spain.

Nearly 1,000,000 women in Spain work in the field as day laborers; 350,000 women are registered as day servants—that is, they work for their food and lodging. There is no such class anywhere else.—N. Y. Times.

HOSPITAL HABITS.

Some People Prefer to Become Public Charges, While Others Have a Horror of Such Institutions.

"Two queer metaphysical problems," said a New Orleans physican, reports the Times-Democrat, "are the hospital habit and the hospital horror. I have encountered any number of cases of both and have always found them more or less of a puzzle. The hospital habit is well known to every institution in the country, and in speaking of it I have no reference to the scores of constitutional loafers and vagabonds to be found in all large cities who would rather spend their time in any kind of shelter, even that of a jail, than to go out and hustle for a living. The people I have in mind are of entirely different stamp, and are generally of rather superior intelligence. For some mysterious reason they become fascinated by the peculiar life in a hospital and will resort, eventually, to all kinds of subterfuges to continue in it. It is clear they are not attracted by a prospect of idleness, for they are always morbidly anxious to curry favor by making themselves useful, and will work harder than the paid attendants, so the only way they can be accounted for is on the theory that they are really in love with their surroundings. One of the most singular cases of the hospital habit that ever came under my observation was that of an Englishman who spent a couple of years here in the latter 80s. He was a middle-aged man, well educated, well read and capable of earning a good living at his profession, which was that of an accountant, but he had fallen under the strange spell of the hospital and apparently lost all other interest in life. I am satisfied he was in excellent health, but he pretended to be suffering from some obscure spinal trouble, and feigned the symptoms so cleverly that he had spent the best part of six or seven years in different institutions. Meanwhile he had become an excellent nurse and was so far superior to the average hired help that the surgeons winked at his fault for the sake of having him around. There are a great many curious phases of human nature continually in evidence in a sick ward, and I really believe this man derived an intellectual pleasure in their study. He evidently had a taste for the bizarre, and the place interested him as one might become interested in some morbid novel. We had many long talks, and what he said showed a high order of thought. Finally he drifted away and, I dare say, he is in some hospital at this moment. Others I have encountered seemed to find some frightful perverted pleasure in the mere spectacle of human suffering, and I have known one or two women who invariably tried to be present at surgical operations as volunteer assistants.

"The hospital horror is a less cryptic emotion," the doctor went on, "but some of its manifestations are sufficiently queer. Viewed in the abstract, a hospital is eminently the proper place for anybody who is sick, and in future years I am sure no serious cases will ever be treated in private homes. Imperfect sanitation, incompetent attendance, danger of contagion and a score of other reasons suggest themselves immediately as against the practice, and statistics show clearly that the percentage of recoveries is very much higher in any well conducted professional institution. It often happens that the very tenderness and over solicitude of friends and relatives militates against a cure, and all these things are, or ought to be, perfectly apparent to anybody who gives the subject a moment's thought. Yet there are thousands of people who have an unconquerable dread and loathing of a hospital. They would rather be sick in some cheerless tenement, neglected, unattended and deprived of every comfort than to occupy the best special room that a first-class institution can afford. They may be entirely isolated from the general wards and see nothing whatever of the internal workings of the establishment, but the mere knowledge that they are under the same roof preys on their nerves and retards progress. I was called in last winter to attend a man who had contracted pneumonia, and found him in a miserable gallery bedroom, with no facilities for heating and the most squalid and depressing surroundings I ever saw in my life. Some friends came to the rescue and arranged for his admission as a pay patient in one of the very best hospitals. I thought he would be overjoyed, but he turned livid with fright and aversion and begged to be allowed to remain where he was. 'My God! doctor,' he pleaded, 'don't let them take me there! I can't stand it!' I told him bluntly he would die unless he was moved, but that prospect had no terrors compared to those of the hospital. He was an intelligent man, knew perfectly well he would get the best of care at the place suggested, but was simply unable to overcome an innate sense of repulsion. He died a few days afterward in his bleak little bedroom. On another occasion a patient of mine was taken to a hospital much against his will and given every attention in a beautiful private room. His convalescence was very unsatisfactory, and I couldn't understand what was operating against recovery. One day he burst into hysterical tears. 'Oh, doctor!' he wailed, 'take me away! Take me anywhere out of this ghastly place!' He had no complaint to make; it was 'just the idea,' to quote his own words. He was sent home and was soon well. It is useless to argue with such people; the prejudice is unreasoning, and they can no more help it than they can help the color of their hair."

Bill—Did you say that gun of yours would shoot 1,000 yards?

Jill—That's what I did.

SHROUDED IN MYSTERY.

A Check for a Large Sum Was Cashed in a Singular Manner.

"There isn't a great deal of romance in my business," remarked a prominent Chicago banker to a writer for the Washington Star the other day, "but now and then something turns up out of the ordinary and makes us wonder at the peculiarities of those who have dealings with us. I recall an instance just now which is as yet not explained, and will never be, I fancy, as the chief actor in it was killed some time ago in a railway accident. I never knew the man personally, but he was a depositor in our bank, whose account was a personal one to the extent of $10,000. He carried that much as a rule, and the few checks that he made against it never indicated what his business was. He was about 50 years of age, and very rarely came to the bank. Naturally I nver gave him a thought, for $10,000 is not a large deposit in Chicago, and beyond his deposit I had no interest in him.

"It happened, therefore, that when one day I received a personal letter from our depositor I was a bit surprised, and was still more so when I had read it. I do not recall the exact wording, but it was to the effect that within a day or two a woman would present a check for $5,000, and that as she was unknown he wished me to see that she received the money without trouble, and that she would bring with her means of identification in the person of a little girl, who would answer correctly the questions I must ask her, as directed in his letter, with the answers as he gave them. These questions were simple enough, being only the child's full name, her age to the month, where born, the full name of her mother and her father and of a 'little brother' who was dead. Five thousand dollars was a good deal of money to let go on that kind of evidence, but that was all I had, and the depositor was in California, so that I could not see him personally.

"Well, the next day the paying teller came to me with his eyes bulging, saying that about as hard a looking case of beggar woman as he had ever seen was at the window with a check drawn to the order of Mrs. Blank by Mr. ——, and that as he did not know the woman and the woman did not know how she was to get the money, he had come to ask me about it. I sent for her to come into my private office, which she did, bringing the little girl with her, who was no less a picture of abject poverty than the mother was. All that she could say was that she had received the check by mail from a man whose name was not familiar to her, with instructions to present it at the bank, and the money would be paid her, if she would take her little girl with her. I asked the child the questions I had been requested to ask, and she answered correctly each one, which relieved me of further responsibility, and I ordered the check to be cashed. The woman did not seem to be greatly overcome by her good fortune, and as I could tell her nothing of the man who had given the money to her, she didn't seem to have any further use for me, and went back to the paying teller's window. She asked for the money in $50 bills, and, wrapping it up in an old newspaper, went out of the bank without a word to anybody.

"She was no longer at the address she gave when I sent a messenger there to make inquiries, and her benefactor I never saw again, for he met his death on his way east from California. I fancy he would not have told me the story of his life, but I shall always wonder if the name we carried on our books was the one he carried in his youth."

A DEAD-GAME WINNER.

Joshua Got a Warm Reception by His Wife After Betting on the Horse Races.

He did not arrive home for dinner until 7 o'clock the other evening, and he looked gloomy as he hung up his hat in the hall. She sat waiting for him, with a stern face, in the sitting-room.

"Perhaps you will be good enough to explain," she said in a hard tone, "what kept you away from your—"

"Cynthia," he interrupted, "I have been—heaven forgive me—at the races!"

She leaped from her chair with a suppressed cry of deep misery of spirit, and stood confronting him.

"Joshua Upblock," she exclaimed, wringing her hands, "how dare you stand there and calmly tell me that you have lost those $47 you had with you when you left the house this morning? Do you not know—it's a pity you're not old enough to know—that the race tracks bring wretchedness and shame and misery and degradation to more American homes than 20 entire census forces could enumerate? Do you think you can afford to lose half a month's pay at a miserable race track when your poor, suffering wife hasn't a single stitch to her back that is fit to be seen? Do you—"

"But," he cut in, with a grin, pulling out a wad of about the proportions of a bottle of olives and throwing it on the table, "I didn't do a thing but eat up the card from beginning to end, and I socked 'em with a 20-to-1 shot in the last race. And it's just up to you to pick out your automobile coat and your turquoise ring."

"Why, you dear, lovely, precious, tantalizing old thing you!" she exclaimed, with brimming eyes, throwing her arms around his neck.

Dist. No. 7. ANDREW SHARTZER.

To the Hon. John Walter Smith, Governor of Maryland.

Baltimore Morning Herald.

You stand at the parting of the ways. The next few days will be the most momentous in your life. You must either call an extra session of the legislature or you must refuse to do it. If you call it you will take your place with the Goebels of American politics. From one end of this country to the other you will be classed with those who have for partisan or personal gain sought to take from the people their most precious prerogative. What does it mean to any man to be numbered in such company? If you do not know recall the fate of Judge Maynard, of New York. He had been a man of excellent character, and up to the time of the commission of the act which ruined him he had borne a stainless reputation. Like you, he was pressed by his political friends and associates to do that which he did. They gave him, as your advisers are giving you, specious reasons why it was right for him, under the circumstances, to do what they wanted him to do. They told him that the people of the State of New York had for years been giving at every election a large Democratic majority. The unfair legislative apportionment of the state allowed the Republican minority to continue in control of its government, and to deny to the people that new census and new apportionment to which, by the constitution, they were entitled. It was pressed upon him that it was in his power to remedy all these wrongs, and by the commission of what they represented to be at most a technical offense to secure his party's rights.

He yielded. For the moment his action passed with not a great deal of comment, and among his party associates with almost a total absence of criticism. Yet when the first excitment was over and the people had time to think soberly, Maynard was a doomed man. From that day until now his name has been a hissing and a reproach. Moreover, not only was he ruined, but his party utterly failed to obtain any of those results for which he had sacrificed name and fame.

To call and control a constitutional convention was the great object which he and his party associates had in mind. That convention was called. At the same election at which its members were chosen he and his party's candidate for Judge of the Court of Appeals of his state. The 100,000 majority by which the people condemned his assault upon the sanctity of their electoral rights carried down with it his party's candidates for that convention, and its last state was worse than its first.

Is there not a lesson here for you, Governor Smith? Trust not the tempters around you. It matters not what alluring prizes they hold before you. Whatever may be the result of a special session, if it be called, or what laws it may enact, one thing is sure—the Governor who is responsible for such a session held for such a purpose will be thereafter a marked man. The very men who are now urging him to take so great a responsibility will be the very men who will refuse the gratification of any political ambitions he may have, because they will say and say truly, that his identification with the call for this session will make him too heavy a load for his or any other party to carry.

Governor, do not deceive yourself. Sometimes, it is true, the bold and unscrupulous man in politics attains a triumph. Sometimes his bay tree remains green and flourishing until the end. Such men, however, are those who are the designers and not the instruments of the schemes by which they profit. All the state knows that this extra session is not of your planning. If it is called, you will be surrendering your better judgment to the pressure, the importunities and temptations of others. Under such circumstances, you will bear most of the blame—others will reap all the benefit.

We have said that you stood at the parting of the ways. It is true. You have not yet, in any public way, committed yourself. You can still be true to what we believe is your own inmost conviction. You can say that you will be no party to any advice which will change or altar our present election laws. By so doing you will step at once from the position of a follower to a leader. You will be thereafter recognized throughout the state and by all classes of citizens as a man who not only speaks and acts for himself, but who speaks and acts in conformity with the dictates of a high and enlightened public conscience. From the moment that you thus make yourself the champion of popular rights you become the strongest man in your party. The choice is before you. Which road will you take?

Extra Session No Nearer.

The Tantalus cup of extra session still dangles temptingly before the lips of the Democratic leaders, but is apparently no nearer being quaffed than it was on Saturday. If anything, it is a little further away, for the illness of State Senator Jacob M. Moses will preclude any possibility of the Legislature meeting for at least ten days.

Senator Moses submitted to a severe, though not dangerous, surgical operation Sunday at his home in Baltimore and his brother, Mr. Daniel M. Moses, said that Dr. Samuel T. Earle, his attending physician, had given no hope that he would be able to leave the house inside of ten days.

As the vote of every Democratic Senator would be needed to pass any partisan legislation, it would seem likely that even if an extra session should be called this week it would not be dated to begin earlier than March 1. As March will begin on Friday, and as Governor Smith has arranged to attend the inauguration on March 4, the time may not be before March 6.

Governor Smith is indisposed, suffering with a sore throat and an annoying cough.

Communicated.

To the Editor of The Republican.

In one of my letters from the "Sunny South" I spoke of forming the acquaintance of a lovely, intelligent lady of position and wealth, who, nevertheless, bore on her countenance the marks of some terrible sorrow. From her I learned the sad story which reads like a romance, but is a true tale. I will not give location or name. The latter is well known in social and political circles.

On the shore of a beautiful southern bay stands a handsome building, of modern architecture, furnished with rare paintings, works of art, oriental rugs, treasures from the old world, a magnificent piano, etc. This is the abode of love, peace and joy, I said. Alas! How little we can judge.

Some years ago a brilliant young man graduated from one of our colleges. Always a hard student, fine linguist, grand performer on the piano, and plenty of money, he turned his attention to scientific pursuits. The physicians warned him that he was overtaxing his brain. His parents pleaded in vain. The collapse came. He became melancholy, suspicious, and avoided society. The father sank beneath the blow. The heroic mother resolved to devote her life to her only son. The physicians said it was a most singular case and the only way to ever ameliorate his sad condition was to take him to some secluded spot. They went south and for a time his mind was diverted by seeing to the erection of the home I alluded to. Then his attention flagged. Visitors were prohibited. He positively forbid any one to even cross his extensive grounds. Now the mother's brave heart failed her. She knew her son was doomed.

I have often seen him pacing up and down the sands. Tall, erect and handsome, with piercing black eyes, looking straight ahead; speaking not to friend or foe. Often the mother would come to me and sitting together on the cool gallery, with tear-dimmed eyes and thin, nervously clasped hands, unburden her heart. Surely it seemed "there was no sorrow like unto her sorrow." "Oh, if I could only help him to bear the burden," she would say, "but to see him suffer day after day and I am powerless. I hear him rise all hours of the night and roam through the house, or playing the wildest music, dying off into the saddest minor key. I glance from my window and see him wandering through the trees and shrubbery battling alone with his agony. Again he will rap at my door, begging to come in, and I dare not, for I am alone in the large house and I have been warned of my danger." What a sad picture—the son kneeling before the mother's closed door in the midnight hour and she, torn with love and fear, denying him admittance. One day he silently stroked the once glossy hair, now grey with sorrow and pain, and then softly said: "Poor mother, this life is killing you. I am not worth it."

A beautiful summer day; the birds were singing and flowers blooming and all nature rejoicing, she came to my home. "Oh!" she exclaimed, "the worst has come: they are going to take my son from me. Why can they not let me have him? He harms no one, but they say he is a menace to the public. If he consents to leave of his own accord, they will be satisfied, and I have begged and pleaded with him, but he insists that he will not be driven from his home like a felon. I told him some of their grounds of complaint. He replied: 'All was true. My reason is this: I meant no harm, but I am so terribly lonely, and in the evening when I see our next neighbor's parlors lighted up, and young people laughing and talking and sweet music, I can't resist the temptation of stealing through the shrubbery and looking in at the windows.'"

I thought of Longfellow's beautiful poem—

"In happy homes he sees the light
Of household fires gleam warm and bright,
And from his lips escaped a moan."

Young, talented, wealth and yet an invincible barrier between him and the world in which he has no part.

She eventually persuaded him to go. I saw them part. She was to follow as soon as their business was arranged. He stooped to kiss her and then jumped into the boat that was to carry him away, and she turned back to her desolate home, doubtless echoing the old Bible cry: "I am bereaved of my child, I am indeed bereaved."

The most singular feature of it all is, he transacts business, buys tickets, and pays his hotel bills without trouble.

When I returned to Maryland she accompanied me to join her son in one of the border states.

I have had several letters from her, but her daily sacrifices, her struggles, her sorrow are sacred. She says: "I can only hope and pray and wait. Pray for us."

In the opening of his life glorious possibilities lay before him, and now, alas!

"Of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these—it might have been."

Died Near Ronceverte, W. Va.

David Bittinger, aged 22 years, son of Alexander Bittinger, of Hutton, died at a farm house near Ronceverte, W. Va., on Thursday last. The deceased had been working for the firm of Brew and Brown, saw mill operators, and was sick about ten days, when he felt better and returned to work. On Wednesday he was again taken ill and started to walk to the town of Ronceverte, but feeling worse he went into a farm house along the road, where his condition became serious and where he died the next morning about six o'clock. His remains were brought to Oakland Saturday, accompanied by Mr. George T. Brew, and interred at the home farm near Hutton.

Consumption

is destruction of lung by a growing germ, precisely as mouldy cheese is destruction of cheese by a growing germ.

If you kill the germ, you stop the consumption. You can or can't, according to when you begin.

Take Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil: take a little at first.

The genuine has this picture on it, take no other.

It acts as a food; it is the easiest food. Seems not to be food; makes you hungry; eating is comfortable. You grow stronger. Take more; not too much; enough is as much as you like and agrees with you. Satisfy hunger with usual food; whatever you like and agrees with you.

When you are strong again, have recovered your strength---the germs are dead; you have killed them.

If you have not tried it, send for free sample, its agreeable taste will surprise you.

The weather this week has been of a changeable nature, snow, sleet and rain following in quick succession. An Elkins visitor said his father was a preacher and a thoroughly pious man. He would often upbraid the family and relatives for lack of faith. He told them that with faith enough they could fly. A good sister of the good man constructed a pair of wings and after attaching them to her shoulders, jumped from a second-story window to take an ariel voyage. The result was a twenty-foot fall to the ground, and both arms were broken. The preacher rushed to her assistance and tenderly picked her up, remarking, "Susan, you have the right faith, but the wrong flop."

It was Horace Greeley who said: "It is strange how close men read the papers. We never say anything men don't like but what we soon hear of it. If however we happen to say a good thing, we never hear of that; nobody seems to notice it. We pay some men a hundred compliments, and give them a dozen puffs, and they take it as a tribute to their greatness never think it does them any good, but if we happen to say anything one of these men does not like or something he imagines reflects on his character, see how quickly he flares up and gets excited about it. Then our evils are charged up to us but we never apparently get credit for the good we do."

Important Will Case in Court of Appeals.

Mr. John T. Mitchell, administrator of the estate of the late Miss Maria A. Sherman, appeared in the Court of Appeals at Annapolis on last Friday and assisted Mr. R. T. Semmes, of Cumberland, in arguing the case in which the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church is appellant and Mr. Mitchell, as administrator, is appellee. The appellants in the case were sent down from the Circuit Court of this county, in equity, passing upon certain legacies in the will of Miss Maria Adelaide Sherman.

The contestants over the construction of the will of Miss Maria Adelaide Sherman, who, after making certain bequests, devised the residue of her estate to the board of managers of the Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church, to be used to educate girls in Bible reading in India.

The suit, it is claimed, was brought for the purpose of setting aside the will on the ground of uncertainty in the devise and the decree below against the will, and the appeal taken by the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society upon the theory that the testatrix intended to leave the money to them and not to the board of managers of the other society, who were incompetent to take it, not being an incorporated institution.

Danger of Colds and La Grippe.

The greatest danger from colds and la grippe is their resulting in pneumonia. If reasonable care is used, however, and Chamberlain's Cough Remedy taken, all danger will be avoided. Among the tens of thousands who have used this remedy for these diseases we have yet to learn of a single case having resulted in pneumonia, which shows conclusively that it is a certain preventive of that dangerous malady. It will cure a cold or an attack of la grippe in less time than any other treatment. It is pleasant and safe to take. For sale by all druggists.

Electoral Vote Was Counted Yesterday Afternoon.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13.—The reelection of President McKinley was made official today. The electoral vote for President and Vice President was formally canvassed by the Senate and House of Representatives, the tally being kept by two Senators and Representatives, and the election of McKinley and Roosevelt as President and Vice President, respectively, ascertained.

The tellers reported that McKinley and Roosevelt had each received 292 votes and that Bryan and Stevenson had received each 155 votes.

Though the ceremony was formal and monotonous in its simplicity, the galleries were crowded with spectators, chiefly ladies, and much interest was manifested.

Serious Freight Wreck.

A serious freight wreck in which turtle back engine 1866 and helper engine 1610 were badly demolished, occurred at 4:15 o'clock Monday morning in Kingwood tunnel on the First district of the Baltimore and Ohio. Engineer J. E. Doolan and Fireman C. H. Ritter, of the helper, were both painfully, but not dangerously injured. It is said Engineer Doolan had one ear cut off. Fireman J. Coleman, of the 1866, had his knee badly mashed. The accident occurred about a half mile under ground and the tunnel being only single track made it very much more difficult to clear up the wreck. The wreck was caused by the 1610 running into the 1866 as the latter was pulling a heavy train up the grade and the helper was returning from helping another train up. Both engines and several cars were derailed and about 125 feet of the track torn up.

The 1866 was pulling along very slowly on account of her helper failing for steam or the accident would have been more disastrous. As it was all trains both east and west were delayed several hours. Eastbound express trains Nos. 8 and 2 were delayed 10 hours. William Linn, of South Cumberland, engineer of the 1866 escaped injury, except being badly shaken up. Engineer J. E. Doolan was taken to his home at Newburg and Firemen C. H. Ritter and J. H. Coleman were taken to Cumberland. One of the engines after being dragged from the tunnel was taken to Rowlesburg and the other to Newburg, where they were disconnected and hauled into the South Cumberland shops to be repaired.

A Night of Terror.

"Awful anxiety was felt for the widow of the brave General Burnham of Machias, Me., when the doctors said she would die from Pneumonia before morning," writes Mrs. S. H. Lincoln, who attended her that fearful night, but she begged for Dr. King's New Discovery, which had more then once saved her life, and cured her of Consumption. After taking she slept all night. Further use entirely cured her. This marvellous medicine is guaranteed to cure all Throat, Chest and Lung Diseases. Only 50c and $1.00. Trial bottles free at all druggists.

Appointed Constable.

Mr. George Giessman was on last Friday appointed constable for the 14th district to fill the vacancy which has existed for some months in this office. Mr. Giessman's experience as Deputy Sheriff when he resided in Preston county, W. Va., fits him to fill the position to which he was recently appointed. The Commissioners are to be commended also in making the appointment of so excellent an officer.

Killed at Hutton.

Wesley Conners, aged about 55 years, was instantly killed at Hutton Sunday by being struck and run over by a freight train. The deceased was walking along the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio and stepped from one track to the other and directly in front of the train which killed him, the engine and cars passing over his body. His remains were sent to his home at Amblersburg, W. Va., for interment.

GARRETT COAL LANDS.

Developing Rich Deposits That Need an Outlet.

W. S. Sharpless and F. R. Sharpless of Swanton, are the owners of valuable coal lands on the Backbone Mountain, on the south side of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, which are underlaid with three distinct veins of coal—a 4-foot, a 6-foot, and a 9-foot vein. The 6-foot vein, which is pronounced to be equal in quality to the best coal produced from the big vein colliers in the Georges' Creek region, is open and being operated on a limited scale, but the present lack of transportation facilities to the Baltimore and Ohio stands in the way of any extensive development of this vein of the lands adjoining those of the Sharpless brothers, which also have the same mineral deposits, are hampered in like manner, and it is understood that all are favorable to the formation of a company for the purpose of securing the necessary means of transportation to the Baltimore and Ohio, either at Swanton, about 2½ miles distant, or at No. 40 water station, between Swanton and Frankville, about 1½ miles distant. If the latter route be selected an incline plane about half a mile long would be required.

West Point Examinations.

Congressman Pearre appointed Hon. A. M. Gould, of Montgomery; Hon. H. S. Keedy, of Washington; Mr. H. Urner, of Frederick; Prof. J. E. Edwards, of Allegany, and Mr. L. A. Rudisill, of Garrett, a committee to examine candidates for admission to West Point. The committee met in Washington, D. C., on the 8th and 9th inst. All the members of the committee were present. There were six applicants for the place, among them W. J. Shartzer, of Oakland. Eleven slips were placed in a hat. Each slip had a different letter of the alphabet on it. The candidates drew a paper and wrote their name on it, placed the slip in an envelope and sealed it, placing their letter on the outside. Each candidate placed his letter on such examination sheet submitted. The examinations consisted of five questions in grammar, geography, history and arithmetic and the spelling of twenty-five words. At least thirty minutes were given to each subject. After the papers were all in the committee retired and passed upon the several papers. After the papers had been carefully examined and the award made by letter the envelopes were opened and it was found that the scholarship belonged to A. Rutherford, of Montgomery county, with C. P. Page, of Frederick, as alternate.

No Grip Here.

"It hasn't got us" nor have we got it—the grip, but there is a great dearth of local news in our columns this week simply as a result of no happenings having come under our observation.

THE HILLS OF LONG AGO.

When I backward turn my eyes
Dim against the distant skies,
Where the hues of Memory glow,
Rise the hills of Long Ago.

Comrade mine, while yet we may,
Let us thither for a day;
Tread the paths untrodden long,
Hear the unforgotten song;

See the faces fond that seem
Gazing at us through a dream;
Clasp the hands we clasped of yore
Kiss the lips of Love once more!

Set against such joy as this
Paltry is our present bliss!
Ah, the wild, free, youthful will,
And the swift, ecstatic thrill!

Comrade mine, while yet we may,
Let us thither for a day—
Back into the wonder-glow
To the hills of Long Ago!

Two Dinners at Pennington's

By Mrs. Moses P. Handy.

(Copyright, 1900, by the Authors' Syndicate.)

ALBERT WHITNEY knew that he could not marry. He was a sensible fellow, on the whole, and realized that it would be sheer idiocy to ask a woman to share his hall bedroom.

Yet Albert was in love.

Every Sunday in church he sat opposite Miss Gladys Pennington, and thought of her far more than he did of the sermon.

Miss Pennington's father was a retired carpet manufacturer, with a tidy fortune, to which Gladys and her brother James were sole heirs.

Albert was a clerk in a wholesale hardware store and, by hard labor, earned ten dollars a week. Of this five dollars went to his landlady.

The moth sighed for the star, and Albert sighed for Miss Pennington. The moth and the star were hardly further apart than Albert Whiting and Gladys Pennington. Albert had never spoken to her; she barely knew that he existed.

What, then, were Albert's feelings when, one day, after church, Mr. Amos Pennington pompously approached him and invited him to dine at his house on the following Sunday? He blushed like a girl, and stammered out an acceptance. Fortunately, Mr. Pennington did not wait for more. The invitation which meant so much for Albert to him meant only the discharge of a rather disagreeable duty which he admired himself for performing. He would have been thunderstruck at a refusal. Every year he obtained from the pastor of the congregation, of which he had long been senior deacon, a list of the young men who were punctual at church and summoned them to dinner. The good man liked to encourage piety and bestowed invitations on these exemplary young men in precisely the same spirit with which he awarded prize books for "regular attendance at Sabbath school."

The following Sunday, when Albert entered the Pennington drawing-room, punctually at two, he was surprised to find already there, besides the host, his wife, his son and daughter, 15 black-coated individuals with all of whom he was pretty well acquainted. The assembly reminded him of a special meeting of the "Young Men's union."

It fell to Albert to escort Miss Pennington in to dinner. He, poor lad, was overwhelmed with the honor. He did not know that father Pennington, who exercised a strict supervision of his daughter's acquaintance, had chosen him as the most harmless and unassuming of the 16 young men.

Albert could think of absolutely no remark with which to open conversation. Miss Pennington, entirely at ease, saw his blushes with more pity than wonder. She was accustomed to her father's duty dinner parties and rather expected the guests to be awed. Mr. Whitney's shyness spoke in his favor, as a tribute of respect to her father. Mr. Pennington had brought his children up to strict observance of the fifth commandment.

"It is rather warm for the time of year," quoth the young lady, breaking the ice.

Albert raised his eyes and assented. He would have done so had Miss Pennington said that it was cold.

"What nice eyes he has," thought she. It was unusual for Gladys to notice a man's eyes. "It was frightfully hot at the lake last August," she said, aloud. "I think it could hardly have been warmer in town."

"It wasn't bad in town, except in the middle of the day," replied Albert, bravely.

"So you were not fortunate enough to be away on your vacation?"

Albert laughed. "No, I have my vacations in November." It was then October.

"That must be nice for shooting," murmured Miss Pennington, vaguely. "You hunt, don't you?"

"I fish a little," answered Albert.

There was another silence. Miss Pennington turned to her other neighbor. Then Albert found courage to speak to his, a young man whom he knew quite well.

A November vacation was Hobson's choice with Albert. Sometimes, if trade was active, he got none at all. He came last on the list of clerks at Jobson's. But, when he could, he thankfully packed his bag and went to spend two weeks in the Wisconsin woods with his only living relative, a great-uncle.

Great-uncle Morris was fond of the boy and good to him. His log cabin and little farm would hardly support one, and Uncle Morris held it the duty of every man to do his share of the world's work. Albert did what he could for Uncle Morris. He bought a small stock of groceries and shipped them ahead of his annual visits in order that the expense of his entertainment might not be a burden, and he faithfully sent the old man the best Christmas and birthday gifts that he could afford. Uncle Morris had told him once that the farm would be his some day and sometimes, when Albert felt despondent at his slow promotion, he pictured himself as living in the cabin, in old age, without even a nephew to visit him. The thought made him tender toward the old man.

Just as Albert was about to speak to Miss Pennington, once more, he heard her father's voice: "My dear young friends," and the rest of the dinner was devoted to remarks, partly instructive and partly catechetical, from that gentleman.

Nevertheless Albert went home rejoicing. He felt that he had made a great step. Thereafter, he was entitled to raise his hat respectfully to Miss Pennington on Sunday and upon the rare occasions when he met her on the street. Moreover, as in duty bound, he made his dinner call and acquitted himself with credit, his conversation being mostly with Mrs. Pennington.

Great-uncle Morris died suddenly that year, not long after Albert returned from his November vacation. It was a shock and a surprise to his nephew, for the old man was still vigorous and had seemed in even better health than usual. Albert obtained leave of absence without salary and, drawing his little balance from the savings bank, hurried to Wisconsin to be present at the funeral. The attendance was larger than he had expected; he was pleased to see how many friends and neighbors came to do honor to the dead. Chief among the assembly was Judge Steinberg, of Oshkosh, who greeted Albert cordially.

After the services were over, the judge accompanied Albert back to the cabin and seated himself in Uncle Morris' chair, with the air of a host rather than that of a guest.

"Of course, Mr. Whitney, you know that you are your great-uncle's sole heir, but I believe that you are not aware that Morris Whitney was one of the richest men in the county."

"No—was he?" gasped Albert.

Judge Steinberg smiled. Like most men, he enjoyed telling a good story.

"I have known your uncle all his life; we were friends in youth, and I have always enjoyed his confidence. Years ago he had an experience which caused him to lose faith in all women, and most men, but which it is not for me to repeat. He bought this farm, which is larger than it appears, for much of it is leased, and retired to this out-of-the-way spot. It was his delight that you should love him for himself alone. The annuity which your mother received, after your father's death, was paid by him on the express condition that she should not enlighten you in regard to his affairs. I have to congratulate you on the inheritance of a very considerable fortune, which is excellently well invested. I shall be pleased to act as your agent, as I was your uncle's, but that is for you to decide."

Albert listened with dazed attention, that hardly left room for joy, to the long list of stocks and bonds of which he was now the possessor. All of them were at par, and some of them far above it.

"I am utterly inexperienced," he said, "and know nothing of business, except in the hardware trade. I could ask nothing better than to have such an agent as yourself. If it is to your advantage as well as mine that you should manage the property, I am only too glad."

The family were at breakfast when Mr. Pennington's eye fell on this paragraph in the Daily Conservative:

"Albert Whitney, clerk in the employment of Jobson & Co., importers and wholesale dealers in hardware, is the sole heir to the estate of his great-uncle, Morris Whitney, of Door county, Wis., recently deceased. The estate, in addition to lands, amounts to over $500,000, mostly invested in standard stocks and bonds."

He read it aloud. "Albert Whitney," he said, "surely that is the excellent young man whom we know. I must telephone to Dr. Shepherd for confirmation.

"Hello—good morning, doctor. Albert Whitney, of Jobson & Co., is the same Mr. Whitney who belongs to our church, is he not?—I thought so. Have you read the paragraph about him in the Conservative, this morning?—I thought you would be.—So am I."

Mr. Pennington returned to the breakfast table. "I am sincerely rejoiced," he said. "It is providential that so large a fortune should come into the hands of a young man of such piety and rectitude."

Gladys looked up, pleased and interested. She thought again what nice dark eyes Mr. Whitney had.

"My dear," said her father to his wife, "we must invite him to dinner again and introduce him to some of our prominent people. As we did not ignore him in his obscurity, we can better afford to congratulate him on his prosperity."

At the select dinner party which followed Albert was the guest of honor, and escorted Mrs. Pennington to the table. He bore himself with quiet dignity, and Mr. Pennington took pride in the pearl which he had discovered.

The guests departed, the good man announced to his family: "Mr. Whitney is a gentleman of intelligence, as well as of integrity. It is rarely that we find so many good qualities united in the same young man."

Gladys smiled. "I am glad papa likes him so much. I always thought he was nice," she said to herself.

And the gate to Albert's happiness stood wide open.

FATTENING FOR THE BIG FAIR

Kansas City Live Stock Men Will Exhibit a Huge Steer at the St. Louis Exposition.

Mammoth, the huge steer now at the Kansas City stock yards, is to be a prominent figure at the word's fair to be held in St. Louis in 1903, says the Kansas City Times. Of course, Mammoth would be a prominent figure anywhere. He is seven feet one inch in height, measures nine feet in length and weighs about 3,000 pounds. And Mammoth is but a baby, being only two years of age. The baby is a fine, healthy product, however, and in three years he is expected to weigh at least 6,000. That is, he will if the doctor takes good care of his health, and Mammoth is to have a special physician—a veterinary, of course. Then he will have several acres on which to graze all by himself, and that combination should help him some.

L. A. Allen, a prominent live stock commission man at the stock yards, is responsible for the agitation concerning this elephantine brute. Mr. Allen proposes to introduce a unique feature at the fair. His scheme is to purchase Mammoth and to place him on exhibition alongside of the smallest steer bred in the original Louisiana tract. The two steers will thus represent the growth and development of the Louisiana purchase since the time of Jefferson. The small steer will be emblematic of the territory as it was when Napoleon disposed of it in 1803. The large animal will represent the wonderful strides of the nineteenth century.

Both animals are fitting representatives of the Louisiana territory, as both were bred there. The smaller of the two, who might kick at being shown up as a back number if he had any say as to the cast of the allegory, is scarcely four feet high. He is a cousin of the famous Wing, that weighed over 4,000 pounds at eight years of age. An organized movement is already on foot for this display three years from now. Mr. Allen stated to a reporter for the Times that a syndicate would be formed to buy the mammoth steer. The capital stock of the company will be $2,000, each share valued at $100. A number of stockmen have already signified their willingness to take an interest in the affair.

All the plans have not yet been perfected, but after the ground where the animal will graze has been purchased, a comfortable shed will be built, and a keeper and veterinary surgeon engaged. Mammoth's partner will be selected from among the small steers that still exist in the state of Louisiana, the same breed that was there when Jefferson purchased the territory. Mammoth himself is said to have been developed from the same type. L. Levy, a wanderer from Palestine, is said to have been the first to cultivate the big branch from which Mammoth came. The animal was raised by A. A. Crandall, of Little River, Kan.

WHAT THE LETTERS MEANT.

An Old Baltimore Caterer Who Was Not Behind Others of Degree.

"When you mention the name of John Reilly you touch a reminiscent chord in the hearts of hundreds of the older residents of Baltimore," remarked a well-known gentleman the other day, says the Sun.

"John Reilly," he continued, "many years ago kept a saloon on South street. It was a popular rendezvous and always crowded. It was then the only place in the city where one could get old ale on draught, and his oysters—well, they were indescribable. His fried oysters were savory enough to tempt a man to evil; the raw box was a continual source of delight, and the savory stews served drove away the weightiest of business cares.

"Reilly was a jolly old man, full of native wit and sparkling with keen repartee. His place came to be the favorite resort of the most brilliant men of his day.

"On one occasion Reilly had to journey to Philadelphia on business. It was in the time of the old stage coaches, and he made his way leisurely along. Upon arriving there he registered at one of the leading hotels. That leads up to my story.

"At that time it was customary for men to add to their signatures such titles or evidences of dignity as they possessed. When Reilly looked over the hotel register he saw something like this:

"John Jones, LL. D.
"William Smith, A. M., A. B.
"Samuel Johnson, D. D.

"Seizing a pen he inscribed the following: 'John Reilly, F. R. S.' Then he went about his business and spent a pleasant and profitable afternoon.

"Returning to the hotel at night he was met by a committee of leading and learned citizens They greeted him with great deference and expressed their gratification that such a distinguished man should be in their midst. He was urgently requested to deliver a lecture before some scientific body during his stay. You see, they judged from the mystic letters on the hotel register that he was a fellow of the royal society and had come to do him honor.

"Reilly was a man of imposing personal appearance. He made himself very agreeable to the committee, but could not name a date for the lecture. When they left him a friend asked the reason of the demonstration.

"'What do you mean by writing the letters "F. R. S." after your name, anyway?' he asked.

"'Well,' replied Mr. Reilly, with a merry twinkle of the eye, 'they mean "Fried, raw and stewed," and I serve the best in Baltimore.'"

MEAT DIET NECESSARY.

Men Who Have to Do Hard Work Require an Abundant Share of Animal Food.

Every now and then one hears of the remarkable good health enjoyed by those who adhere to a strictly vegetarian diet. And much can be said in favor of its economy, as well. But there is reason to believe that some people are so constituted that they can get along with less nourishment than others. Moreover, the character and quantity of labor performed by a man or a woman has much to do with their food requirements. The season of the year, too, is a factor in the problem. In cold weather or a cold climate fats seem to be requisite to the production of internal warmth. And at all times of year persons engaged in hard physical labor appear to need a certain amount of meat. Norburne B. Jenkins, of Chicago, recently discussed this matter in a public address, and, although his remarks were intended to apply chiefly to factory and mill operatives, they suited the farmer as well. He said:

"The workingman of this country has to think as he works. He is in no sense a beast of burden; he cannot live on grain. One-third of the blood in his entire body is needed to keep his brain active. His labor is fiercely fast and competitive. All this and more is in his work that is not in others. He needs rapid nerve repairing food, strong red meats. He cannot do such work except with these. A man might be a quiet, intellectual sage on vegetables, or can be a beast of burden and live on such if he has the right kind of viscera; but he cannot do fierce, nerve smashing competitive work, or be a good soldier without meat and plenty of it.

"One needs a certain racial, geographical and anatomical disposition to be a good vegetarian. Of all peoples we Americans are the least so qualified. The vegetarian races have, on an average, five to ten feet more of intestines than meat eaters, and so can live and toil on grain and vegetables, but they cannot build warships, bridges, typesetting machines, skyscrapers, locomotives, etc.

"It is safe to say that this country's unprecedented use of meat has had nearly as much to do with speeding and progressing civilization as either coal or iron. The American cannot do the skilled and speedy work required of him and meet the world's competition, as he now does, unless he has an abundance of meat."

ELECTRICAL HEATER.

An English Device for Warming Rooms That Has Cleanliness to Recommend It.

Herbert J. Dowsing, of London, has designed the electric novelty illustrated below, which at least has cleanliness and neatness to recommend it. As will be seen by a glance at the picture it is simply a series of elongated electric-light bulbs arranged in a metallic frame, with reflectors at the back. Any desired number of lights may be used, and a switch is provided to cut off those not in use. In addition to the reflectors the stove is provided with a series of air inlets at the bottom, through which the air currents ascend, passing around the bulbs and out into the room upon striking the slanting hood at the top. The heater is arranged to stand in the fireplace, if one is provided in the room, or it can be placed in any desired place, which makes it possible to bring the stove near a chandelier for reading purposes. The extreme lightness and small amount of attention required will recommend it to many persons, the attachment of the wire to a lamp socket and turning on of the current being all that is required to start the stove going.—Chicago Daily News.

Why Steel Rails Break.

In 1895 a steel rail on the Great Northern railway in England broke into 17 pieces, causing a serious accident. A committee of the board of trade appointed to investigate the cause of the breakage has only recently made its report, after four years of work on the subject. The committee ascertained that the particular rail which broke on the occasion described possessed certain abnormal features, the precise origin of which remains undetermined, but the investigation led to several discoveries of scientific and practical importance. Among these is the surprising effect of cracks in the upper surfaces of rails. It was found by experiment that a rail nicked with a chisel to a depth of a sixty-fourth of an inch broke under a weight of 600 pounds falling from a height of 12 feet, while the same rail not nicked resisted the fall of a ton weight from a height of 30 feet.

SOLDIER'S HEAD DRESS.

An Ingenious Englishman Suggests a Helmet That Would Be Useful as Well as Decorative.

The universal head dress for the army is the ingenious conception of an Englishman, who claims for it the advantages of being both useful and ornamental, inasmuch as the foundation consists of two separate and essential articles built of aluminium, and so constructed as to form an efficient head dress.

In order to carry out the idea of usefulness combined with ornamentation, the regimental badge or helmet plate is replaced by the knife, fork, spoon and shaving-brush—marked A, B, C and D in our illustration—for fusilier battalions, as a recompense for the deprivation of the bearskin. On foreign service, moreover, the soldier can use his towel as a puggaree.

USEFUL AND DECORATIVE.

Among the further advantages which this helmet affords the soldier is that a considerable portion of the weight is transferred from his back on to his head.

The letters R and L are intended as a guide to young officers giving the command: "Right" or "Left," while F and B (behind) are a means of knowing the front or back of the company without appealing to the color sergeant.

E is the razor strop, while the helmet itself is divided into two portions marked F and G, signifying respectively upper canteen, or mug, and lower canteen, or wash basin.

ODORS AND SMELLS.

French Scientists Propose an Undulatory to Replace the More Common Emissive Theory.

The ordinary explanation of the phenomena of odors and of smells is precisely that adopted by the ancient Greek philosophers. They held that smell particles of the odoriferous body were detached and transmitted by the air to the mucous membrane of the nose. The actual contact of these emitted particles with the nasal membranes produced the sensations of smell.

A similar view was held by the ancients, and even by Sir Isaac Newton, as to the explanation of the phenomena of sight. Corpuscles were supposed to be darted out in every direction by a luminous body and to fall on the retina of the eye. By this contact the phenomena of vision were produced. The theory of emission of light has since the time of Huyghens been replaced by the undulatory theory of vision. Molecular motions in the luminous body set up movements in the surrounding ether—light waves. These waves travel through the ether and enter the eye and there set up corresponding movements of the elements of the retina, and these movements are the cause, and the only cause, of the phenomena of seeing. The brain interprets the sensation by the light of experience.

MM. Vaschide and Van Melle have lately proposed an undulatory theory of smell to replace the emissive theory, and have enforced it by reasons too special to be recited here. They declare that smell does not arise from a direct contact between particles emitted from an odoriferous body and the ends of the olfactory nerves, but that the odoriferous body sends out a set of radiations analogous to light waves, X-rays, etc.—analogous but not similar. The arguments of the authors of the new hypothesis are ingenious, if not entirely convincing as yet. Their theory deserves and will receive a thorough investigation. In the meantime we may consider the question as an open one. Certain it is that the commonly received theory leaves many things unexplained.—N. Y. Sun.

Tea Is Popular in Russia.

Tea was first imported into Russia in 1638. To-day each inhabitant consumes on the average nearly one pound annually. The total consumption is 106,000,000 pounds and the total cost about $88,000,000. Tea and sugar together cost Russia about $265,000,000 per year. For brandy, beer and wine the country expends annually about $560,000,000, so that something like a quarter of the whole revenues of the state are annually expended on tea, brandy, wine and beer, with sugar. Exact statistics are not forthcoming, but it appears that the use of tea is increasing rapidly relative to the alcoholic beverages—a consummation devoutly to be wished.

Shrines in Machine Shops.

In Russia every shop building has its holy picture and lamp, and it seems odd to an American to think of religious services being held in boiler and machine shops, as they are occasionally in Russia. The Locomotive Engineering recently had an illustration of one of these pictures.

Casey's Case.

A Canadian gentleman, named Casey, was appointed to a government place which technically had to be occupied by a lawyer, which Mr. Casey was not. The benchers of the Law society, however, undertook to deviate the technicality, and appointed one of their number to examine him as to his knowledge of the law.

"Well, Casey," said the examiner, "what do you know about the law, anyway?"

"Well, to tell the truth," said Casey, modestly, "I don't know a single thing."

"I have examined Mr. Casey as to his knowledge of the law," the examiner stated in his affidavit, "and to the best of my knowledge and belief he answered all the questions entirely correctly."—Law Notes.

Physicians recommend Kemp's Balsam as a remedy for patients afflicted with the grippe, as it is especially adapted for the throat and lungs. WELL-MANNERED PEOPLE.

They Are Welcome Wherever They Go and Add Much to the Real Enjoyment of Life.

Good manners are more important at home than elsewhere. As they cannot be put off and assumed, as a garment, we are able to form our opinion of a person's home manners by his manners in society. As a rule what are called "company manners" are as easily distinguishable as the counterfeit coin from the pure gold. A beautiful behavior is better than a beautiful form; it gives a higher pleasure than statues or pictures; it is the finest of the fine arts. How well it is that no one class has a monopoly of this "finest of fine arts." While favorable circumstances no doubt render good manners more common among persons moving in the higher spheres of society, there should, nevertheless, be no positive hindrance to the poorest classes practicing good manners toward each other. For what are good manners? They are the art of putting our associates at their ease. Whoever makes the most people comfortable is the best-mannered person in the room, and nowhere is there so much opportunity for displaying good manners as in conversation. Well-mannered people do not talk too much. They are careful to bear in mind the meaning of the first syllable of the word conversation, con (with), that it means talking with another; they abstain from lecturing, and they are as ready to listen as to be heard. They are neither impatient to interrupt others nor uneasy when interrupted themselves. Knowing that their anecdotes or sharp repues will keep, or need not find utterance at all, they give full attention to their companion, and do not by their looks show that they consider him a bore. Another rule observed by every good-mannered person, besides that he should not be impatient to get in his word, is that a few brilliant flashes of silence should occur in conversation. Another rule is not to select one's self to talk about. It must be borne in mind that as a rule we and our concerns are of no more importance to others than they and their concerns are to us. Why, then, should we go over the annals of our lives generally, and our diseases in particular, to comparative strangers? Why should we review the hardships we have suffered in money matters, in love, or our domestic troubles, or why should we boast of our success? It is unnecessary to state that gossip or scandal-bearing is incompatible with good manners. "The occasions of silence," says Bishop Potter, "are obvious; mainly, when we have nothing to say, or nothing but what is better unsaid. If we must speak of our fellow-beings let it be of good, and if we have naught but bad to say of them, better not speak at all."—S. S. Times.

CONDUCTS BIG RANCH.

Enterprising Young Woman Is Making a Large Fortune in Cattle All by Herself.

Nadine Parmer, better known in western Texas and Mexico as Miss Million, is rapidly acquiring a large fortune. Only a few years ago this remarkable young woman was teaching music in a small village in central Ohio. She was an orphan, with limited advantages and opportunities.

MISS NADINE PARMER.
(This Miss Is Making a Fortune All by Herself in Cattle Raising.)

Now she owns a big cattle ranch and runs it herself.

Miss Parmer was adopted by a rich ranch owner, who was killed by being thrown from a bronco. The ranch was offered for sale, and she bought it, including 700 head of cows, with money given her by her benefactor during the five years she was with him.

In the course of the next four years her herds increased until it was difficult for her to find pasturage in Texas, and she was forced to send agents to old Mexico to rent and buy grazing lands. In order to befriend her former pupils, who were deep in distress, she bought the famous Broad Ax brand and the ranch.

COUNTESS VON BULOW.

A Charming Woman and One of the Most Talented Musicians in the German Empire.

One of the most fascinating and talented women in Germany is Countess Bulow, wife of the new chancellor of the empire. Not only does she possess great beauty, but she is noted as one of the most talented musicians in Germany. She is no longer youthful, for she has a daughter of 32, Countess Eugenia Doenhoff, and a son who is captain of horse in the imperial army. It is not given out how many years Countess Bulow has to her credit; that is left to conjecture, but she still retains the graces of youth. No wrinkles furrow her brow and her figure is lithe and erect, while her manner is as vivacious as that of a woman of 30. She rides, drives, plays and hunts with all the enthusiasm of a young woman just arrived at maturity, and yet 25 years ago she stood for one of the figures in Makart's great canvas: "Charles V.'s Entry in Antwerp." It is admitted that she is on the shady side of 50. According to the fashion of her own country, the second lady in the empire retains her maiden name of Princess di Camporeale—a great title that she can well afford to support out of the revenues of her marquisate of Altaville, Sicily. She became marchioness when scarcely five years old, upon the death of her father. The income is nearly 1,000,000 francs per year, and it is said that she hoarded up the greater part of it while her husband was waiting to step into the shoes of the ancient Hohenlohe.

COUNTESS VON BULOW.
(Wife of the New Chancellor of the German Empire.)

This winter her grace promises to show Berlin what a rich and clever woman can do in the position she holds. Under Bulow's predecessor the grand old palace on Wilhelm strasse had ceased to be a resort of fashion and gayety. Mme. Bismarck was plebeian and parsimonious, Caprivi happened to be a bachelor with the taste of a sublieutenant, old Princess Hohenlohe entertained in her own castles and country seats, but never in a shop-keeping city, as she used to put it, and after her death the chancellor's stateroom was opened only on very rare occasions for a mixed crowd of parliamentarians and other political pot boilers with scarcely a sprinkling of persons that belonged to high life.

It will be all so different now. Count Bulow has twice the salary and perhaps five times the private income that Prince Bismarck enjoyed; he is a youth compared with Hohenlohe, and his wife as much of a grand dame as the late princess, and as his conception of office holding is to do the imperial master's will without questioning and without offering either advice or opinion, he never worries, never poses and so has plenty of time for society.

Invitations for several receptions and state dinners and to two big balls to come off before Christmas are out.

Liszt used to call the princess his favorite pupil and the finest amateur pianist in Europe. Her grace's music-room is a museum filled with charming reminiscences of the gypsy abbe. "Look," she said, pointing to a large crayon, "this represents a scene from our concert at the Palais Auersberg in Vienna, 1885. I had then for the first time consented to play in public. Of course, only the cream of the aristocracy was admitted and they paid fabulous prices for the privilege. We made, I believe, some 25,000 florins for the benefit of the poor that evening."

The artist has depicted Liszt and the princess at the piano. Liszt seems to be thoroughly pleased with his partner, for his mighty head with the long silvery mane is proudly thrown back and his eyes are afire with the pleasure art gave him. It's easy to believe that his pupil was then the reigning beauty of Vienna, home of fine women. But no, she wasn't "beautiful," or at least not exactly beautiful—we have the great Makart's word for that. "Marie Anna is fascinating," he wrote; "to call her beautiful would be too much and yet not enough. The man who called her pretty I would thrash."

At the age of 17 the present countess married Count Doenhoff, a diplomat of some note. At Dresden the princess first met her present husband, then a simple baron, attached to Count Doenhoff's staff. Domestic unhappiness followed and she took up her residence at the Italian embassy in Vienna, over which her stepfather then presided. It was but a short time afterward that her husband died and she married Count Bulow, who had by that time attained considerable distinction as a diplomat. His rise was rapid, and now he stands at the right hand of the emperor, while his beautiful wife is the first lady of the land.

During the year ending June 30 last, Jasper county, Missouri, produced zinc and lead worth $5,339,629.

HOG-LOADING CHUTE.

Device by Which a Disagreeable Job Is Robbed of Some of Its Annoying Features.

Loading hogs is usually a disagreeable task. This job is greatly simplified where an elevated pen with a floor on a level with the wagon bed is available, but there are few farmers whose feed lots are thus arranged. The only way to load the porkers is with an improvised chute, which is always more or less of a nuisance.

A substantial chute with an inclined floor—the longer the floor the better, as the ascent will be less steep—is made of four-inch fencing, spiked to a frame of 2x4 inches, with posts of 4x4-inch stuff. To add to the solidity of the affair, the 2x4 and 4x4 should be bolted together. The floor can be made of plank or rough lumber of any kind. It is necessary to nail cleats upon the floor to prevent the hogs from slipping. One end of the chute rests on the ground, while the other is on a level with the wagon bed floor. This chute should be made of as light material as stability will allow, for it is often convenient to change its location. The rest of the arrangement is two sections of slat fencing, to be used as wings. One end of each section is fastened to a side of the chute and unrolled. When set up the two wings will make a large V, of which the point is the chute. The hogs can be easily driven inside the V; then the two ends of the slatting can be brought together. The hogs will thus be confined in a small pen to be loaded.—Orange Judd Farmer.

BUYING PURE BREEDS.

Fowls That Are Perfect in Every Respect Command Prices That Seem Extortionate.

If you desire birds that will enable you to compete at fairs, do not expect to buy them at a small price. If you wish to breed first-class exhibition stock next season, do not be afraid of the expense. It costs time, money and skill to breed up flocks to a high average, and the prices usually asked are always extortionate. If you are not particular about exhibiting, and desire some strong, vigorous birds that have no faults except a twist of the comb or some slight defect, for crossing on common stock, let the breeder know it when you write and he will try to accommodate you. Remember, no breeder generally has two birds at the same price. They are sold according to quality. Therefore, be particular to describe your wants, and do not expect the breeder to know your desires. A fair hatch from 13 eggs is seven—or one over half—though some are satisfied with five. No breeder can guarantee every egg to hatch. He knows no more about them than the buyer, but he should endeavor to send eggs from vigorous stock. A customer would be fortunate if he got a pair of first-class standard birds from a sitting of eggs. Some breeders do not get such a pair from a dozen sittings. The customer is responsible for the hen that sits on the eggs, and her management while on the nest. Some customers do not know good birds when they see them, and often complain ignorantly. The breeder must depend on any statement sent him, without being able to verify or deny it. Before complaining ask yourself at what price you will sell the chicks should you receive an order for them, and make a comparison between their value and their cost.—Farm and Fireside.

Fraud in a Show Ring.

A remarkable case has recently been tried at Birmingham, England. A farmer there showed a young bull for which he was awarded a first prize. The bull was afterwards sold at a very high price. The second prize winner protested the age of the bull, and on investigation it was found that the animal was nearly three months more than the age given, and should have gone in an older class. Fraud in recording the age was pretty plainly brought home to the exhibitor and the presiding judge fined him $600. The English press regards this as a well-merited, though severe, punishment and expects it will prove a warning to unscrupulous competitors at stock shows. The judge ordered the culprit to be kept in prison till the fine is paid.

Trained Ferrets on Farms.

We are asked how to train a ferret to hunt rats. It needs no training. It is natural for it to hunt rats. If it is placed at the opening of a hole, it will enter it, and when it has driven the rat out or killed it it will come out of the hole and can be picked up. What is called a trained ferret will do nothing more or less. All ferrets, however, are not alike. Some will hunt better than others. Some will bite, and can hardly be broken of the habit. But practically a ferret is a ferret, and is a fearless hunter. These animals are exceedingly valuable on a farm that is infested with rats.—Agricultural Epitomist.

A Wonderful Cure of Rheumatism of the many thousands cured by

DR. GREENE'S NERVURA.

The greatest known cure for RHEUMATISM.

Mr. T. H. Roleau, of Essex Junction, Vt., says: "For three years I was terribly afflicted with a most severe case of rheumatism. For 23 months I could not walk a step, and I never expected to walk or work again. I was completely helpless and suffered the most horrible agony.

"No man in these parts ever suffered as I did. I took everything that I ever heard of, but never found anything that did me the slightest good until I began the use of Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy.

"And now comes the most wonderful part of all. In a short time this splendid medicine made me completely well. It is the best remedy I ever saw or heard of, for it raised me from a condition of utter helplessness and constant agony to perfect health. It saved my ability to work which was entirely gone. I am now entirely well and strong, and I owe my health and my life to Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy. I advise everybody to use it."

DANGER IN THE BOOK

WHY ONE MAN DREADED THE COMING INTO CAMP OF A DICTIONARY.

He Discreetly Left Before the Vociferously Applauded Sentiments He Expressed In His Speech Could Be Analyzed a la Webster.

When the son of the president of the Big Mountain Lumber company came into the mountains to learn the business, so to speak, I knew within 15 minutes that he had come to the wrong place. He was a city chap, newly graduated and thoroughly out of touch with everything mountainous. He was a bright fellow, however, and amply capable, only the mountains were not the field for his development. As time elapsed his distaste grew, and it was all he could do not to express his opinion of the mountain people, their manners, customs, homes, morals and everything connected with them. He was wise enough to confide in me alone and bided his time to get away to some more congenial clime. And he got away sooner than he expected.

It happened that there was a public meeting one night at the sawmill shed, and he was called on to make a few remarks. Every other man at the meeting except myself, who acted as chairman, was of the mountains, and their illiterate talk had roused the young college fellow to the limit. He saw a chance to get even, in his own mind at least, and when the call came for him he responded promptly. His speech, quite brief, but to the point, was as follows, copied from his own manuscript, even the [applause] part:

"My friends, I am glad to meet you on this occasion, for I have wished to say to you publicly what I think of you, though our acquaintance has not been long. Coming as a stranger among you, I was only partly prepared for what was in store. Now, let me say to you that half has not been told me. [Applause.] In the internecine arena your lethiferous conduct has artounded me by the trucidation and occision characterizing it among no men I have ever known. [Loud applause.] In the diversified field of mendacity your efforts would make Machiavelli take to the tall timber. [Uproarious applause.] In all furacious, raptorial and predacious pursuits you have done such wonders that the gifted and great Jonathan Wild would have felt his latrociny was a sounding brass and his direption a tinkling cymbal. [Great applause.] In the broad expanse of labor your torpescent oscitation has made you sui generis among all pandiculate mankind. [Cheers and shouts of "Good for us!"] As good livers, your tables groan beneath their stercoraceous and impetiginous burden, and as drinkers, your temulent bibacity has made the crapulous reputation of Bacchus to be a sign of puritanical abstemiousness. [Loud applause.] As for yourselves, I take pleasure in saying here to you, without fear of successful contradiction, that your nugacity is forever established; as observers of the law, your aberrance is teratological, and personally you are a cohesive concatenation of rubigant exuviæ, that I take especial pleasure in believing does not exist elsewhere on earth. [Vociferous applause.]"

When the enthusiasm had cooled down somewhat, he proceeded to speak on the subjects before the meeting and sat down. The mountaineers were pleased to death with the college man's high flown speech about them, and though I didn't know the meaning of all the big words he used I did know that he had been calling them liars and murderers and thieves and scoundrels and drones and lawless drunkards, besides condemning their fare and anathematizing the lot of them personally. But not one of them suspected, and I was hoping nothing would come of it and they would forget, even if any of the large words were remembered, when one day a book agent drove up to the office in a buckboard and announced that he was selling Webster's Unabridged Dictionary for $2 a copy and showed a sample that was as big as a box of soap.

Nobody had ever seen so much book for the money, nor had anybody ever seen a dictionary in that neighborhood, and when the agent began to tell what a valuable thing it was to be in every family the men became interested, and it wasn't long until the agent had sold 25 copies, to be delivered the following week. When he had gone away with his sample, I called the young man into the private office for consultation.

"Don't say a word," he began as soon as he had closed the door. "I know exactly where I am at, and I'll be some place else before Mr. Webster arrives to throw any light on my recent remarks. I am not shedding any tears, and in order that the dictionary buyers and others may know just what I think of them I shall leave two dozen copies of my speech for distribution on the morning of my departure."

He did just as he said he would, and it was a good thing for him that he never came back any more.—W. T. Lampton in Washington Star.

That's All.

"In proof of the assertion that the world is growing better," remarked Optim, "let me mention the fact that we never find stones in the coffee we buy at the grocery stores nowadays."

"No," growled Pessim. "The reason for that is that most persons who buy coffee have it ground when they buy it. The grocers pick out the stones for fear of ruining their mills. The world is growing more enlightened in its selfishness. That's all."—Chicago Tribune.

How to Cure Grip.

Remain quietly at home and take Chamberlain's Cough Remedy as directed and a quick recovery is sure to follow. That remedy counteracts any tendency of the grip to result in pneumonia, which is really the only serious danger. Among the tens of thousands who have used it for the grip not one case has ever been reported that did not recover. For sale by all druggists.

Stood Death Off.

E. B. Munday, a lawyer of Henrietta, Tex., once fooled a grave-digger. He says: "My brother was very low with malarial fever and jaundice. I persuaded him to try Electric Bitters, and he was soon much better, but continued their use until he was wholly cured. I am sure Electric Bitters saved his life." This remedy expels malaria, kills disease germs and purifies the blood; aids digestion, regulates liver, kidneys and bowels, cures constipation, dyspepsia, nervous diseases, kidney troubles, female complaints; gives perfect health. EXTRA SESSION CALLED.

Governor Smith Issues His Proclamation.

The Legislature to Meet March 6th—The Governor's Reasons For Issuing the Call Notoriously Partisan as Well as Puerile.

STATE OF MARYLAND,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

WHEREAS, in view of errors believed to exist in the enumeration in the recent United States census of the population of this State, which errors, if not corrected by an enumeration made under State authority, will give to some sections of the State a disproportionate representation in the House of Delegates; and

WHEREAS, in view of the urgent nesessity of immediate legislation reforming manifest and great abuses in the election law of this State, and also of legislation conferring additional power upon the Mayor and City Council of Baltimore, the immediate exercise of which is imperatively demanded by a due regard to the preservation of the sanitary condition of the city of Baltimore, an extrordinary occasion exists for a special session of the General Assembly;

Now, therefore, I, John Walter Smith, Governor of Maryland, by virtue of the authority conferred and duty imposed upon me by the Constitution, do hereby call a special session of the General Assembly to consider and act upon such measures; said session to begin at noon on Wednesday, the sixth day of March, in the year nineteen hundred and one, to be held at the city of Annapolis.

Given under my hand and the Great Seal of Maryland, done at the city of Annapolis, this thirteenth day of February, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and one, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and twenty-fifth.

Signed JOHN WALTER SMITH.
By the Governor.
WILFRED BATEMAN,
Secretary of State.

After two months' consideration Governor Smith has decided to convene the General Assembly in extraordinary session.

The call was issued Wednesday night, the proclamation being given to the press by His Excellency at his office in the Merchants' Bank Building.

The time set for the Legislature to convene is noon on Wednesday, March 6. By virtue of the limitation laid down in the Constitution, it must adjourn 30 days from that date, but it is hoped the work will be completed before that time. The purpose of the meeting is set out in the proclamation to be to provide for—

A State enumeration:

Amendments to the election law, by which corruption shall be made more difficult;

Legislation to enable the City of Baltimore to construct a sewerage system.

In addition to the proclamation Governor Smith gave out a statement of his reasons for calling the Legislature together. They include—

A belief that the Federal census is incorrect;

A belief that the present election law encourages bribery;

A belief that the registration law permits persons who have no legal residence in the State to come here to vote, and

The urgency for the construction of a sewerage system in Baltimore city.

In addition, the Governor states that ordinary current legislation will not be considered by the General Assembly.

The Governor's statement in full follows:

"To the People of Maryland:—After mature deliberation I have decided that it is my duty to call a special session of the Legislature.

"In my judgment upon a careful review of the situation, an 'extrordinary occasion' exists which a due regard to the welfare of the State requires me to give to the General Assembly an opportunity to consider, pass upon and provide for.

"For some months past urgent appeals have come to me from all parts of the State to take this step, and I have sought to ascertain public sentiment upon the subject by diligent and extensive inquiry. The result of my investigation fully satisfies me that there is a widespread and universal feeling that there ought to be a special session.

"Considerable opposition has manifested itself to the call, as was to be expected, but, while this has made it all the more necessary for me to weigh the subject with deliberation and care, it obviously could not relieve me of the duty of finally deciding the question for myself under a full sense of my official responsibility. And in determining to issue the call it is no small gratification to me to feel that I am sustained by an aroused public opinion, which, while not entitled to control my own judgment, I yet am not at liberty to disregard.

"Having said this much, I might, perhaps, well postpone a statement of the reasons which have influenced me until in a formal and official shape I can lay them before the General Assembly in the special message which I shall send to the two houses when they convene. But in view of the somewhat harsh comments which the suggestion of the call of an extra session has elicited, it is proper that I should give now some explanation of the grounds upon which I deem it my duty to exercise the power conferred on me by the Constitution and to obey its mandate.

"First—The necessity of a prompt census of our population under State authority in view of the palpable errors and dangerous and unjust results in certain of the counties under the recent Federal census.

"The framers of our present Constitution of 1867, wisely following the precedent sent them by the draftsmen of the Constitution of 1864, made provision in Sections 3, 4 and 5 of Article 3 for a rearrangement and reapportionment of the representation to which the several counties and Baltimore city should from time to time be entitled, for upon the justice and fairness of this representation the excellence of our State government depends. The people of the several counties are manifestly interested, not only that their own counties shall have all the representation to which their population, as prescribed by the Constitution, entitles them, but they are also equally interested that other counties shall not, as the result of fraud or mistake in the census, obtain an undue representation and thus an excessive and overshadowing share of legislative power.

Express provision is, therefore, made for an enumeration of our population under State authority, and the duty is laid upon the Governor, after each Federal census or State census, to issue his proclamation declaring the number of delegates to which each county is entitled.

"Under the recent Federal census a result has been announced as to some of the counties which is so totally contrary to popular belief that I am unwilling, in a matter of so grave concern, to accept it as correct and to act upon it until it shall be subjected to scrutiny and verification under State authority. I feel that I ought not to officially proclaim that to be a fact which personally and individually I do not believe to be true, nor to give my official sanction to that which I believe to be both untrue and unjust.

"I feel that my duty forbids my blindly accepting and acting upon the figures given out without official investigation, and this enumeration, being begun, should be made thorough and complete and cover the whole State, so that there can be no mistake anywhere and no ground for complaint of disproportionate representation from any section whatever. The value of accuracy and fairness in so vital a matter as this is well worth the moderate expense of a State census.

"The situation, in my opinion, clearly presents an 'extraordinary occasion,' directly govered by the provision of the Constitution declaring that the Governor shall convene the Legislature or the Senate alone on extraordinary occasions. But this is not all.

"Second—Our election law.

"The practical working of our present election law demonstrates the imperative necessity of a prompt alteration of some of its provisions.

"It is not possible to shut our eyes to the fact that under the sections relating to registration of voters many thousands of voters not bona fide residents of the State are permitted to register and go to the polls, and by their votes materially influence, and in some quarters absolutely control, the votes of our resident population. This is a great and palpable evil. No fair-minded man can say that it ought to be permitted to exist. In my judgment it ought to be cured and prevented by effective legislation before, at another election, it can again make itself oppressively felt.

"Third — Bribery. Still further. Something must be done without delay to protect the suffrage from bribery and to secure the secrecy of the ballot. This certainly is an object of the highest importance, and no one can honestly contend that it ought not to be accomplished, if possible, at the earliest moment.

"I believe it can be accomplished without interference of the legal rights of any voter by some amendments of our existing law wholly free from constitutional objection.

"The necessity for the prompt passage of an enabling act authorizing the city of Baltimore to provide, without further delay, an edequate sewerage system is urgent, and the special session may also consider and dispose of this most important subject.

"The expense of a special session cannot be great, for the session will necessarily be brief, and will not be expected to take up miscellaneous matters of legislation, which can well await the next regular session.

"Calling the special session only for special purposes of great importance and urgency, I wish it to be distinctly understood in advance that my executive approval will not be given to any matters of ordinary current legislation.

"With this emphatic announcement there need be no fear that any legislation will be enacted outside of those measures for the passage of which the special session is called.

"I fully realize the responsibility of the call which I have decided to issue, but upon the best consideration which I am able to give to the whole situation, I feel that the conclusion which I have reached is right and will be approved by the great body of the people."

Although the call for the extra session had been expected every day for some time, the issuance of the proclamation came as a surprise.

No intimation that the call was to be issued was given, and it was not until nearly 8 o'clock that Governor Smith handed the proclamation and his statement to the reporters. He would not talk further on the subject, saying that the statement gave his views in full.

It was ascertained from sources close to the Governor that the illiteracy bill has not been drawn. It is probable, however, that it will be on the lines of the Massachusetts ballot law. His Excellency is opposed to any change being made in the election machinery, and, it is understood, does not favor a change in the registration law.

The reference in his statement to the persons who are not legal residents of the State being permitted to vote refers to men who have a real residence in Washington, but who vote in Maryland. It is estimated by the Democratic leaders that 2,000 negroes who live with their families in Washington and other places vote in Maryland. Under the Federal law, residence in Washington does not take from a man the right to vote at his former home, but the Democratic managers think they have a plan which will prevent the abuse of this privilege.

Governor Smith expressly states that "no ordinary current legislation" will be considered, and this will prevent the consideration of the familiar "bell ringing" bills which are a feature of the regular sessions. At the same time, it is reasonable to assume that bills changing the lines of the legislative districts in Baltimore city and the Congressional districts will not be considered "ordinary current legislation."

The Governor's emphatic statement on this point will tend to shorten the life of the session, and thereby curtail the expense of the State. To lessen the expense the number of employes will be greatly reduced. Only those absolutely necessary will be employed. The engrossing clerks will be very few. It is stated that the session will not increase the State tax rate, though the Legislature will, of course, have to make appropriations for the session and for the cost of the State enumeration.

The enumeration will probably apply to the entire State. It is estimated that it will not cost over $30,000. It has been suggested that the police department may be called upon to take the census in Baltimore city.

On the Boom.

A correspondent writing from Grantsville says of that town and the surrounding country:

A few days in Grantsville has convinced me that the community is on the eve of quite a boom. The new railroad up the Casselman river is already graded to Bittinger, coming south through a splendid coal field and the best of timber. The farmers are taking advantage of the splendid sledding by delivering cross ties along the line of the new road by the thousands. I am informed that the coal is being bought up and a large coal plant will likely be in operation in the near future. The small mines now in operation cannot supply the demand for fuel and for burning lime, which the farmers are getting out in large quantities.

A CORRECT STATEMENT OF IT.

John M. Nelson Sizes Up Extra Session Call.

From Hambleton's Circular.

"WHEREAS, In view of errors believed to exist in the recent United States census of the population of this State, which errors, if not corrected by an enumeration made under State authority, will give to some sections of the State a disproportionate representation in the House of Delegates; and

"WHEREAS, In view of the urgent necessity of immediate legislation reforming manifest and great abuses in the election law of this State, and also of legislation conferring additional power upon the Mayor and City Council of Baltimore, the immediate exercise of which is imperatively demanded by a due regard to the preservation to the sanitary condition of the city of Baltimore, an extraordinary occasion exists for a special session of the General Assembly."

And that is all.

So the State and people are to be put to the inconvenience and expense of an extra session because the Governor and his advisers believe that the United States census is incorrect, that great abuses of the election law exist, and that an enabling act should be immediately passed permitting Baltimore city to borrow money to build an adequate sewerage system.

Putting the last reason first—the only consistent one, in our opinion—it is most desirable that the city should build sewers; but, considering that our statesmen have heretofore turned a deaf ear to the appeals of the people for the preservation of their health, we fear there is a lack of sincerity in their conversion to the idea that the occasion demands immediate action.

The other reasons, or excuses, for the extra session are purely political.

Read between the lines, the Governor's proclamation seems to us to mean about as follows:

WHEREAS, The enumeration of the recent census of the population of this State will give to certain sections of the State a possible opportunity to send Republican delegates to the Legislature; and

WHEREAS, In view of the fact that the present election law has given the people of Maryland the only opportunity possessed during the present generation to have their votes honestly counted, and has deprived professional politicians of the power to wrongfully and fraudulently control elections; therefore, this extra session is called in order that a State enumeration of the people, under Democratic auspices, shall give to certain sections of the State a possible opportunity to send Democratic delegates to the Legislature, and in order that the present election law shall be so emasculated that there shall be only one party in Maryland, and especially in order that that dreadful independent vote, which has been fearlessly and successfully exerted to the purifying of the politics of the State, and which has twice saved the State from the disgrace of being numbered in the Bryan column, shall be eliminated and rendered harmless in the future.

This is the way we read it; and, while we may do the originators of the movement an unintentional injustice, we cannot help believing that they are moved more by party considerations than by patriotic motives.

We never doubted, before this extra session movement was sprung upon the people, that the Democrats would surely carry Maryland next fall, when the members of the Legislature are to be elected, and we never doubted that Mr. Gorman, if he desired it, would be the next Senator. Our experience in swapping Senator Gorman for Senator Wellington has not been altogether pleasant.

We consider the managers of the Democratic party, by forcing the extra session upon the people, and by their acknowledged determination to tamper with the Australian ballot system, have lessened their chances of success.

FAIRMONT COAL FIELDS.

Said to Have Been Sold to Morgan and Rockefeller For $14,000,000.

Several weeks ago a combination of all the coal companies in the Fairmont coal region, the larget and richest in West Virginia, was formed. It was ostensibly for the purpose of marketing the product of the mines through one agency and allotting to the several mines the business in proportion to capacity and securing cars for transportation when needed most. Later a similiar organization was formed in Clarksburg, including more than 20 mines.

When the Clarksburg organization was formed a gentleman known in West Virginia mining circles and who had been present at the Fairmont meeting made a proposition that each Clarksburg company put a selling price on its property, to be considered by a promoting company in New York. This suggestion was to be kept secret, but it leaked out. Within the past week there have been rumors here that the Fairmont companies had made a joint offer of sale and that it had been accepted and that J. Pierpont Morgan and John D. Rockefeller were the principal movers in the purchasing syndicate. The price named as having been paid for all the mines and coal holdings in the Fairmont region was $14,000,000, or an average of something near $400,000 for each mine.

Samuel Kinsey, president and general manager of the Interstate Coal Company later announced that these reports were true; that Morgan and Rockefeller and their associates had bought the entire Fairmont field for $14,000,000 and that they are now negotiating to buy the 20 mines in the Clarksburg region at a price proportionately large. The output and profits of the Fairmont and Clarksburg fields justify the figures named. These fields are looked upon as the best in the country because of their location midway between the Atlantic seaboard and the Lakes and because the men in neither field are connected with the United Mine Workers, the quality and thickness of the coal making it possible to earn larger wages at lower rates per ton than any field in the country.

Pneumonia Can be Prevented.

This disease always results from a cold or an attack of the grip and may be prevented by the timely use of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. That remedy was extensively used during the epidemics of La Grippe of the past few years, and not a single case has ever been reported that did not recover or that resulted in pneumonia, which shows it to be a certain preventive of that dangerous disease. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy has gained a world wide reputation for its cures of colds and grip. For sale by all druggists.

THE NEGRO IN THE SOUTH.

A Perplexing Problem Yet to Be Solved in the Right Way.

To the Editor of The Republican.

The darkest problem in the South is the negro problem. And negro is the right word to use; no other name fits the case.

Whether this perplexing problem ever will be solved remains to be seen. One thing is certain—the right plan for its solution has not yet been found. Many of the wisest heads of both races have been severely cudgled to find a way out of the snarl, so far without success. Another thing is equally certain: If this problem is not solved by the right method—yet undiscovered—it will speedily set about solving itself. Just so sure as 2 and 2 make 4 so sure will the negro race stand in a new relation to their environments before the first quarter of the 20th century shall have passed. And this is not written to reveal the plan that must be found, but rather to direct the attention to the mistakes that have hitherto been made in dealing with the race. When these mistakes have been rightly looked at possibly the needed plan will begin to reveal itself.

And let me say, first, emancipation of the negro was not a mistake; that was an inavitability. Our civilization had reached a plane from which human bondage was viewed as a condition quite intolerable for any race. Our way of securing freedom for the negro was unhappily the most unfortunate. Yet the very way or manner of the consummation was of little moment—it had to come, and the method by which it came was no doubt as good as another that might have been adopted. With us, more than any other nations, it was the "desperate disease requiring the desperate remedy."

But—at least as I look at it—the first mistake in dealing with the negro after his emancipation was failing to colonize him. This should have been completed before the sixties had passed. Three millions of the race could have been handled with comparative ease. Can nine millions ever be handled in such a transaction? As to how and where to colonize would be vain to answer or give an opinion on now. Had the purpose been formed the way and place have been found.

The second mistake was unlimited enfranchisement. It was not so much a vote the slave needed but freedom. It was not a vote the freedman needed but direction and protection. The freeing made him a ward of the nation; the vote was a gift, and it might have been more wisely bestowed. If one in five, or even one in ten, had been given the ballot the negro vote would have been worth more to the political parties than it has been. In the very nature of things an article so bad as the average negro vote could bring no good to any party or cause. We all see this plainly enough now; wonder and pity statesmen failed to see it 35 years ago.

The third mistake I name was over-education. Of course, I speak here of secular education. Two months of schooling out of the twelve and ten months of work would have suited the race much better than eight or ten months at the books, and the small remaining fraction of the year at work. And the range of instruction should have been very limited. The primer and child's book might have left the new learner humble and simple as his books; pushing him on prematurely to the higher branches has, in too many cases, made a conceited fop. This is not intended to apply to a Booker Washington or Bishop Payne. Such as these—rare exceptions—would always find their way past limitations and reach their high places. Neither would I say one word against such schooling of the race as is being done at Tuskeegee. There is room and work for fifty such men and schools today. And such workers would get better results if the start had not been on too ambitious a plane. Wisely taught the race should not have been led away from that meekness and humility so eminently fitting a people in the negro's condition immediately succeeding the civil war. The teaching he has been under has made him highminded and restless.

These statements are not unadvisedly made, and they will not be disproved by contradictions from a thousand miles away. Indeed, no man can adequately study the negro problem in Maine or Michigan. On the ground where he grows is the place to study him.

A deeper view of the problem will be taken later on.

A State enumeration:

Amendments to the election law, by which corruption shall be made more difficult;

Legislation to enable the City of Baltimore to construct a sewerage system.

In addition to the proclamation Governor Smith gave out a statement of his reasons for calling the Legislature together. They include—

A belief that the Federal census is incorrect;

A belief that the present election law encourages bribery;

A belief that the registration law permits persons who have no legal residence in the State to come here to vote, and

The urgency for the construction of a sewerage system in Baltimore city.

In addition, the Governor states that ordinary current legislation will not be considered by the General Assembly.

The Governor's statement in full follows:

"To the People of Maryland:—After mature deliberation I have decided that it is my duty to call a special session of the Legislature.

"In my judgment upon a careful review of the situation, an 'extrordinary occasion' exists which a due regard to the welfare of the State requires me to give to the General Assembly an opportunity to consider, pass upon and provide for.

"For some months past urgent appeals have come to me from all parts of the State to take this step, and I have sought to ascertain public sentiment upon the subject by diligent and extensive inquiry. The result of my investigation fully satisfies me that there is a widespread and universal feeling that there ought to be a special session.

"Considerable opposition has manifested itself to the call, as was to be expected, but, while this has made it all the more necessary for me to weigh the subject with deliberation and care, it obviously could not relieve me of the duty of finally deciding the question for myself under a full sense of my official responsibility. And in determining to issue the call it is no small gratification to me to feel that I am sustained by an aroused public opinion, which, while not entitled to control my own judgment, I yet am not at liberty to disregard.

"Having said this much, I might, perhaps, well postpone a statement of the reasons which have influenced me until in a formal and official shape I can lay them before the General Assembly in the special message which I shall send to the two houses when they convene. But in view of the somewhat harsh comments which the suggestion of the call of an extra session has elicited, it is proper that I should give now some explanation of the grounds upon which I deem it my duty to exercise the power conferred on me by the Constitution and to obey its mandate.

"First—The necessity of a prompt census of our population under State authority in view of the palpable errors and dangerous and unjust results in certain of the counties under the recent Federal census.

"The framers of our present Constitution of 1867, wisely following the precedent sent them by the draftsmen of the Constitution of 1864, made provision in Sections 3, 4 and 5 of Article 3 for a rearrangement and reapportionment of the representation to which the several counties and Baltimore city should from time to time be entitled, for upon the justice and fairness of this representation the excellence of our State government depends. The people of the several counties are manifestly interested, not only that their own counties shall have all the representation to which their population, as prescribed by the Constitution, entitles them, but they are also equally interested that other counties shall not, as the result of fraud or mistake in the census, obtain an undue representation and thus an excessive and overshadowing share of legislative power.

Express provision is, therefore, made for an enumeration of our population under State authority, and the duty is laid upon the Governor, after each Federal census or State census, to issue his proclamation declaring the number of delegates to which each county is entitled.

"Under the recent Federal census a result has been announced as to some of the counties which is so totally contrary to popular belief that I am unwilling, in a matter of so grave concern, to accept it as correct and to act upon it until it shall be subjected to scrutiny and verification under State authority. I feel that I ought not to officially proclaim that to be a fact which personally and individually I do not believe to be true, nor to give my official sanction to that which I believe to be both untrue and unjust.

"I feel that my duty forbids my blindly accepting and acting upon the figures given out without official investigation, and this enumeration, being begun, should be made thorough and complete and cover the whole State, so that there can be no mistake anywhere and no ground for complaint of disproportionate representation from any section whatever. The value of accuracy and fairness in so vital a matter as this is well worth the moderate expense of a State census.

"The situation, in my opinion, clearly presents an 'extraordinary occasion,' directly govered by the provision of the Constitution declaring that the Governor shall convene the Legislature or the Senate alone on extraordinary occasions. But this is not all.

"Second—Our election law.

"The practical working of our present election law demonstrates the imperative necessity of a prompt alteration of some of its provisions.

"It is not possible to shut our eyes to the fact that under the sections relating to registration of voters many thousands of voters not bona fide residents of the State are permitted to register and go to the polls, and by their votes materially influence, and in some quarters absolutely control, the votes of our resident population. This is a great and palpable evil. No fair-minded man can say that it ought to be permitted to exist. In my judgment it ought to be cured and prevented by effective legislation before, at another election, it can again make itself oppressively felt.

"Third — Bribery. Still further. Something must be done without delay to protect the suffrage from bribery and to secure the secrecy of the ballot. This certainly is an object of the highest importance, and no one can honestly contend that it ought not to be accomplished, if possible, at the earliest moment.

"I believe it can be accomplished without interference of the legal rights of any voter by some amendments of our existing law wholly free from constitutional objection.

"The necessity for the prompt passage of an enabling act authorizing the city of Baltimore to provide, without further delay, an edequate sewerage system is urgent, and the special session may also consider and dispose of this most important subject.

"The expense of a special session cannot be great, for the session will necessarily be brief, and will not be expected to take up miscellaneous matters of legislation, which can well await the next regular session.

"Calling the special session only for special purposes of great importance and urgency, I wish it to be distinctly understood in advance that my executive approval will not be given to any matters of ordinary current legislation.

"With this emphatic announcement there need be no fear that any legislation will be enacted outside of those measures for the passage of which the special session is called.

"I fully realize the responsibility of the call which I have decided to issue, but upon the best consideration which I am able to give to the whole situation, I feel that the conclusion which I have reached is right and will be approved by the great body of the people."

Although the call for the extra session had been expected every day for some time, the issuance of the proclamation came as a surprise.

No intimation that the call was to be issued was given, and it was not until nearly 8 o'clock that Governor Smith handed the proclamation and his statement to the reporters. He would not talk further on the subject, saying that the statement gave his views in full.

It was ascertained from sources close to the Governor that the illiteracy bill has not been drawn. It is probable, however, that it will be on the lines of the Massachusetts ballot law. His Excellency is opposed to any change being made in the election machinery, and, it is understood, does not favor a change in the registration law.

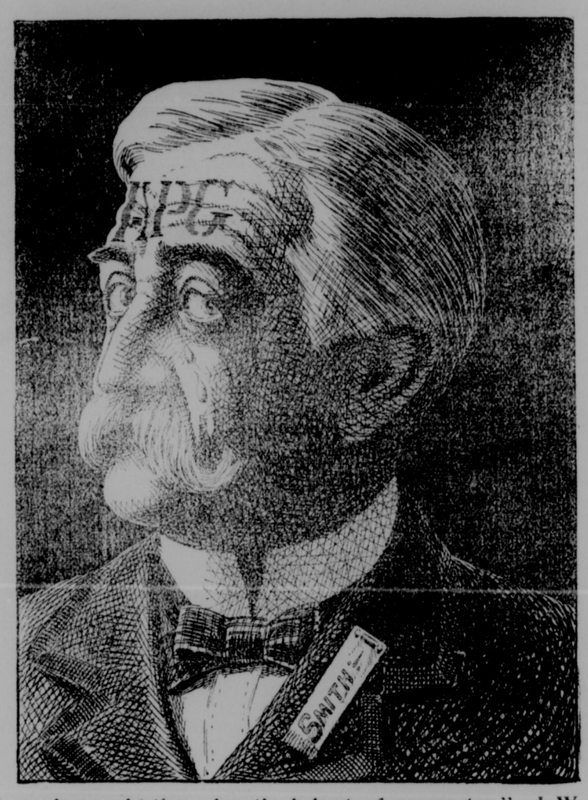
The reference in his statement to the persons who are not legal residents of the State being permitted to vote refers to men who have a real residence in Washington, but who vote in Maryland. It is estimated by the Democratic leaders that 2,000 negroes who live with their families in Washington and other places vote in Maryland. Under the Federal law, residence in Washington does not take from a man the right to vote at his former home, but the Democratic managers think they have a plan which will prevent the abuse of this privilege.

Governor Smith expressly states that "no ordinary current legislation" will be considered, and this will prevent the consideration of the familiar "bell ringing" bills which are a feature of the regular sessions. At the same time, it is reasonable to assume that bills changing the lines of the legislative districts in Baltimore city and the Congressional districts will not be considered "ordinary current legislation."

The Governor's emphatic statement on this point will tend to shorten the life of the session, and thereby curtail the expense of the State. To lessen the expense the number of employes will be greatly reduced. Only those absolutely necessary will be employed. The engrossing clerks will be very few. It is stated that the session will not increase the State tax rate, though the Legislature will, of course, have to make appropriations for the session and for the cost of the State enumeration.

The enumeration will probably apply to the entire State. It is estimated that it will not cost over $30,000. It has been suggested that the police department may be called upon to take the census in Baltimore city.

Owned, Controlled and Branded.



"I can do naught than obey the behests of my master."—J. W. S.

A CORRECT STATEMENT OF IT.

John M. Nelson Sizes Up Extra Session Call.

From Hambleton's Circular.

"WHEREAS, In view of errors believed to exist in the recent United States census of the population of this State, which errors, if not corrected by an enumeration made under State authority, will give to some sections of the State a disproportionate represention in the House of Delegates; and

"WHEREAS, In view of the urgent necessity of immediate legislation reforming manifest and great abuses in the election law of this State, and also of legislation conferring additional power upon the Mayor and City Council of Baltimore, the immediate exercise of which is imperatively demanded by a due regard to the preservation to the sanitary condition of the city of Baltimore, an extraordinary occasion exists for a special session of the General Assembly."

And that is all.

So the State and people are to be put to the inconvenience and expense of an extra session because the Governor and his advisers believe that the United States census is incorrect, that great abuses of the election law exist, and that an enabling act should be immediately passed permitting Baltimore city to borrow money to build an adequate sewerage system.

Putting the last reason first—the only consistent one, in our opinion—it is most desirable that the city should build sewers; but, considering that our statesmen have heretofore turned a deaf ear to the appeals of the people for the preservation of their health, we fear there is a lack of sincerity in their conversion to the idea that the occasion demands immediate action.

The other reasons, or excuses, for the extra session are purely political.

Read between the lines, the Governor's proclamation seems to us to mean about as follows:

WHEREAS, The enumeration of the recent census of the population of this State will give to certain sections of the State a possible opportunity to send Republican delegates to the Legislature; and

WHEREAS, In view of the fact that the present election law has given the people of Maryland the only opportunity possessed during the present generation to have their votes honestly counted, and has deprived professional politicians of the power to wrongfully and fraudulently control elections; therefore, this extra session is called in order that a State enumeration of the people, under Democratic auspices, shall give to certain sections of the State a possible opportunity to send Democratic delegates to the Legislature, and in order that the present election law shall be so emasculated that there shall be only one party in Maryland, and especially in order that that dreadful independent vote, which has been fearlessly and successfully exerted to the purifying of the politics of the State, and which has twice saved the State from the disgrace of being numbered in the Bryan column, shall be eliminated and rendered harmless in the future.

This is the way we read it; and, while we may do the originators of the movement an unintentional injustice, we cannot help believing that they are moved more by party considerations than by patriotic motives.

We never doubted, before this extra session movement was sprung upon the people, that the Democrats would surely carry Maryland next fall, when the members of the Legislature are to be elected, and we never doubted that Mr. Gorman, if he desired it, would be the next Senator. Our experience in swapping Senator Gorman for Senator Wellington has not been altogether pleasant.

We consider the managers of the Democratic party, by forcing the extra session upon the people, and by their acknowledged determination to tamper with the Australian ballot system, have lessened their chances of success.

On the Boom.

A correspondent writing from Grantsville says of that town and the surrounding country:

A few days in Grantsville has convinced me that the community is on the eve of quite a boom. The new railroad up the Casselman river is already graded to Bittinger, coming south through a splendid coal field and the best of timber. The farmers are taking advantage of the splendid sledding by delivering cross ties along the line of the new road by the thousands. I am informed that the coal is being bought up and a large coal plant will likely be in operation in the near future. The small mines now in operation cannot supply the demand for fuel and for burning lime, which the farmers are getting out in large quantities.

FAIRMONT COAL FIELDS.

Said to Have Been Sold to Morgan and Rockefeller For $14,000,000.

Several weeks ago a combination of all the coal companies in the Fairmont coal region, the larget and richest in West Virginia, was formed. It was ostensibly for the purpose of marketing the product of the mines through one agency and allotting to the several mines the business in proportion to capacity and securing cars for transportation when needed most. Later a similiar organization was formed in Clarksburg, including more than 20 mines.

When the Clarksburg organization was formed a gentleman known in West Virginia mining circles and who had been present at the Fairmont meeting made a proposition that each Clarksburg company put a selling price on its property, to be considered by a promoting company in New York. This suggestion was to be kept secret, but it leaked out. Within the past week there have been rumors here that the Fairmont companies had made a joint offer of sale and that it had been accepted and that J. Pierpont Morgan and John D. Rockefeller were the principal movers in the purchasing syndicate. The price named as having been paid for all the mines and coal holdings in the Fairmont region was $14,000,000, or an average of something near $400,000 for each mine.

Samuel Kinsey, president and general manager of the Interstate Coal Company later announced that these reports were true; that Morgan and Rockefeller and their associates had bought the entire Fairmont field for $14,000,000 and that they are now negotiating to buy the 20 mines in the Clarksburg region at a price proportionately large. The output and profits of the Fairmont and Clarksburg fields justify the figures named. These fields are looked upon as the best in the country because of their location midway between the Atlantic seaboard and the Lakes and because the men in neither field are connected with the United Mine Workers, the quality and thickness of the coal making it possible to earn larger wages at lower rates per ton than any field in the country.

Pneumonia Can be Prevented.

This disease always results from a cold or an attack of the grip and may be prevented by the timely use of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. That remedy was extensively used during the epidemics of La Grippe of the past few years, and not a single case has ever been reported that did not recover or that resulted in pneumonia, which shows it to be a certain preventive of that dangerous disease. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy has gained a world wide reputation for its cures of colds and grip. For sale by all druggists.

THE NEGRO IN THE SOUTH.

A Perplexing Problem Yet to Be Solved in the Right Way.

To the Editor of The Republican.

The darkest problem in the South is the negro problem. And negro is the right word to use; no other name fits the case.

Whether this perplexing problem ever will be solved remains to be seen. One thing is certain—the right plan for its solution has not yet been found. Many of the wisest heads of both races have been severely cudgled to find a way out of the snarl, so far without success. Another thing is equally certain: If this problem is not solved by the right method—yet undiscovered—it will speedily set about solving itself. Just so sure as 2 and 2 make 4 so sure will the negro race stand in a new relation to their environments before the first quarter of the 20th century shall have passed. And this is not written to reveal the plan that must be found, but rather to direct the attention to the mistakes that have hitherto been made in dealing with the race. When these mistakes have been rightly looked at possibly the needed plan will begin to reveal itself.

And let me say, first, emancipation of the negro was not a mistake; that was an inavitability. Our civilization had reached a plane from which human bondage was viewed as a condition quite intolerable for any race. Our way of securing freedom for the negro was unhappily the most unfortunate. Yet the very way or manner of the consummation was of little moment—it had to come, and the method by which it came was no doubt as good as another that might have been adopted. With us, more than any other nations, it was the "desperate disease requiring the desperate remedy."

But—at least as I look at it—the first mistake in dealing with the negro after his emancipation was failing to colonize him. This should have been completed before the sixties had passed. Three millions of the race could have been handled with comparative ease. Can nine millions ever be handled in such a transaction? As to how and where to colonize would be vain to answer or give an opinion on now. Had the purpose been formed the way and place have been found.

The second mistake was unlimited enfranchisement. It was not so much a vote the slave needed but freedom. It was not a vote the freedman needed but direction and protection. The freeing made him a ward of the nation; the vote was a gift, and it might have been more wisely bestowed. If one in five, or even one in ten, had been given the ballot the negro vote would have been worth more to the political parties than it has been. In the very nature of things an article so bad as the average negro vote could bring no good to any party or cause. We all see this plainly enough now; wonder and pity statesmen failed to see it 35 years ago.

The third mistake I name was over-education. Of course, I speak here of secular education. Two months of schooling out of the twelve and ten months of work would have suited the race much better than eight or ten months at the books, and the small remaining fraction of the year at work. And the range of instruction should have been very limited. The primer and child's book might have left the new learner humble and simple as his books; pushing him on prematurely to the higher branches has, in too many cases, made a conceited fop. This is not intended to apply to a Booker Washington or Bishop Payne. Such as these—rare exceptions—would always find their way past limitations and reach their high places. Neither would I say one word against such schooling of the race as is being done at Tuskeegee. There is room and work for fifty such men and schools today. And such workers would get better results if the start had not been on too ambitious a plane. Wisely taught the race should not have been led away from that meekness and humility so eminently fitting a people in the negro's condition immediately succeeding the civil war. The teaching he has been under has made him highminded and restless.

These statements are not unadvisedly made, and they will not be disproved by contradictions from a thousand miles away. Indeed, no man can adequately study the negro problem in Maine or Michigan. On the ground where he grows is the place to study him.

A deeper view of the problem will be taken later on.

THE DESPOT.

They knew not whence the tyrant came,
They did not even know his name;
Yet he compelled them, one and all,
To bow in bondage to his thrall;
And from their lips allegiance wrung,
Although a stranger to their tongue.

Whilst he was wrapt in royal state,
Their hours of toil were long and late;
No moment could they call their own
Within the precincts of his throne;
And when they dreamed their work was o'er
He only made them slave the more.

Although the conquering king was he
Of people who had once been free,
No word of praise or promise fell
From him his subjects served so well;
Yet none of those who crowned him lord,
Received a shadow of reward.

Obedience to his behest
Destroyed their peace, disturbed their rest;
Yet when his drowsy eyes grew dim,
Nor mortal dared to waken him,
They stole about with stealthy tread—
"The baby is asleep," they said.

HAZING THE HAZERS

THE new "pleb" at the West Point military academy was undersized and unassuming looking. A shock of brown hair protruded beneath his cadet's cap. He had a habit of smiling when addressed, and showing his white teeth. This habit got him into trouble with a first class "man," a cadet officer, the day after his arrival at the academy. He was taking a walk around the parade ground. He saluted the first class "man" as the latter approached and smiled cheerfully. The cadet officer stopped and glowered at the "pleb."

"Sir," he said, in a deep, chesty tone, "what are you grinning at?"

"Who, me?" said the "pleb." "Oh, any old thing. What do you want to know for?"

"Because, sir," thundered the first class "man," throwing out his chest like a pouter pigeon, "your grin is insulting, sir!"

"It is, hey?" replied the new "pleb," continuing to smile. "Well, what are you going to do about it? Is there any rule around here that forbids a fellow to smile?"

The first class "man" was almost swept off his pins by the audacity of the "pleb's" reply and the unheard-of "impertinence" of the "pleb's" manner.

"Sirrah," said the first class "man," in a tone that was meant to singe the grass on the parade ground, "are you aware whom you are addressing?"

"Well," replied the "pleb," scratching his head with an easy gesture, "I don't know your name, but you seem to have enough gall to permit of your staying part of the distance, anyhow."

The first class "man" was so amazed at the colossal "impudence" of this reply that words almost failed him. A large, somewhat awkward looking "pleb," who just then happened to be passing by, helped the first class "man" out of his predicament.

"Come here, sirrah!" the cadet officer commanded the large, awkward looking "pleb," and the latter, cringing, approached.

"Do you object, sir, to the manner this fellow has of wearing his cap?" said the first class "man," indicating the undersized "pleb" to the other. The latter, looking as if he stood in mortal fear of his life, replied:

"I do, sir."

"Very well, sir," replied the first class "man," in an indignation-choked tone. "You are to thrash the fellow this evening after 'taps.' You," indicating the "pleb" with the shock of brown hair, "are to report at the corral after 'taps' to-night for a licking."

"Good thing," replied the undersized "pleb." "I don't know about the licking, but I'll be there, all right."

The undersized "pleb" was at the corral directly after "taps." He arrived alone, and he was chewing contentedly on a blade of grass when he found the group awaiting him. It consisted of eight cadets and cadet officers, and the large "pleb" who had been selected to thrash the undersized "pleb." The two "plebs" quietly stripped to their trousers and undershirts. The large "pleb" looked as if he would tip the beam at about 170 and measure up to five feet eleven The undersized "pleb" with the shock of brown hair looked to weigh about 125 pounds and to stand about five feet four in his goloshes. However, he looked rather unusually bunchy as to chest and biceps under his undershirt.

They went at it at the insulted first class "man's" signal. The undersized "pleb" danced around his big antagonist like a cooper around a barrel. Then he lowered his head suddenly, ran in under the big "pleb's guard and planted a right-hand wallop on the big "pleb's" chin that broke the stillness of the night like the impact of a mule's hoof on one of the low notes of a xylophone. The big "pleb" went to grass and he took no part in the subsequent proceedings. The cadets standing around looked upon the blow as a chance one, for one of them, a third class "man," at the mumbled instigation of the others, stepped up to the victorious undersized "pleb."

"Sir," said the third class "man" to the undersized "pleb," "you struck that man after time had been called. Didn't you?"

"Not on your life insurance!" quietly replied the undersized "pleb," donning his blouse.

"Ha! then I lie, eh?" exclaimed the third class "man."

"That, or thereabouts," replied the shock-headed "pleb." "Fix it to suit yourself. But don't get gassy with me, or I'll have to hand you a poke."

The bunch of cadets stared open-mouthed at the undersized "pleb" for his hardihood in thus addressing a third class "man."

"You'll have to fight me for that, sir," said the third class "man," endeavoring to make his voice sound ferocious.

"You're on," was the shock-headed "pleb's" reply. "The more the merrier. When do you want yours?"

"Now," said the third class "man," not quite so confidently, and in about two minutes they had squared off at each other. The third class "man" was of about the same proportions as the large "pleb," who still lay dreaming on the grass, but he was quicker on his feet. However, that fact didn't avail him two cents' worth. The undersized "pleb" pranced into him from the drop of the flag, and the rataplan of jolts that he planted all over the third class "man" for a couple of minutes, while the latter never got in a lick, was sure a caution to pythons. It wasn't half as much a caution, however, as the way the undersized "pleb" suddenly drew back, when he ceased to extract amusement from basting the third class "man" all over the latter's person above the waist line and planted his left on the third class "man's" right ear. The third class "man" toppled over like a sack of oats, while the party of amazed cadets rubbed their eyes and wondered if it could all be true—for the just-thrashed third class "man" was the top-notch bully and fighter of West Point.

The cadet omcer who had been so outrageously "insulted" by the victorious undersized "pleb" on the parade ground was the first to recover.

"Seize him," he commanded his six mates still on their feet.

"Wait a minute," put in the shock-headed "pleb," backing away a bit, his blouse hanging over his arm. "What for this seizing?"

"Sirrah, 'pleb,'" replied the cadet officer with an attempt at impressiveness, "it is the custom here to take the conceit out of 'plebs.' You are to be 'braced' and 'exercised' and 'spread-eagled' and 'bucked and gagged' and soaked under the pump, and then you are to drink a pint or so of tabasco sauce with your tallow candles and raw onions, and follow that up with a few kerosene cocktails, and you are to announce that you like these things."

"Oh, I am, hey?" said the shock-headed "pleb," brushing a little spot of dust from his blouse. "That'll be nice. By the way, who's going to have all this fun with me?"

"We are," replied the cadet officer, advancing upon the undersized "pleb," closely followed by the others.

The code of "honor" in vogue at the West Point military academy among the cadets forbade any of the latter from mentioning what happened just at this juncture, but a plain soldier of engineers, who saw the whole performance from behind a little knoll a short distance away, has told about it. The cadet officer didn't get hold of the undersized "pleb" at all. Neither did any of the others. He knocked them down like nine-pins. As soon as they scrambled to their feet he knocked them down again. After being knocked down the second time, they all remained down, quite indifferent to what was going on around them. Then the undersized "pleb" strolled around the laid-out ones, gave each of them a good swift kick where kicks are customarily administered and strolled away. Nine cadets did a hospital stunt on the sick report of the West Point military academy for periods varying from ten days to three weeks after that night.

A large delegation of Terry McGovern's friends met him when he stepped off the gangplank of the West Point boat in New York on the following night.

"This hazing game," remarked Terry—who had been designated a cadet by a "sporty" congressman just for a lark, and to see what would happen to the featherweight—"this hazing game isn't such a much of a hard proposition. It's easier'n giving exhibition bouts any time. It's a bully way to keep in training, at that. I'm going to try now to get Mr. Amos J. Cummings to have me appointed to Annapolis. I like being hazed."

HERE'S AN AUTO-SLED.

Maine Inventor Has Constructed a Singular Vehicle for Use on Snow or Ice.

Automobiles of the ordinary kind are rather scarce in this state, but when it comes down to sleighing in style, the Pine Tree staters are in a fair way of outdoing the rest of the country this winter. Ira Peavey, of this city, a mechanic of experience, has just completed the model of an "auto-sled" and says that when the thing is completed he will be able to plow through the deepest drift ever piled on Main street and transport passengers with dispatch.

The auto-sled will be ten feet long, three feet high and four feet in width, and will be propelled by a gasoline engine of 20 horse-power. In forcing the sled forward two steel cylinders are used, each 10 feet long and 26 inches in diameter. Wound around these cylinders and firmly attached to the outside, are spiral cams, two inches high and three inches wide, with deeply-concaved surfaces and capable of taking hold of the most icy surface. The cylinders are attached to the engine by means of bevel gearing, and the speed can be easily regulated to suit the person who guides the vehicle.

Mr. Peavey calls his invention an "auto-mo-sled," and is confident that it will make rapid time on the snow-covered highway or on ice. He has been working on the steam sled for more than five years and the greatest part of this time was spent in experimenting with the revolving runners. He found that if both the spirals were put on right-handed that the sled would go to the right, while it would go the other direction if the spirals were left-hand. After he had made one right and one left-handed, there was more thinking to be done. By putting the coils close together, he could develop great power of propulsion, but could make but little speed. Spirals put wider apart gave speed without power, and to meet both conditions he has constructed two sets of runners, one for work on the level road and the other for hill climbing.

The cylinders run fore and after with the auto and the power is furnished by double piston rods so arranged that the engine can never get on a center. The tubing and framework as well as the cylinders are of thin highly-tempered steel, so that the whole sled, with boiler, seats, engine and all does not weigh over 1,200 pounds. The vehicle is guided by a set of runners attached to the front of the main body of it and has a handle running back to the driver's seat like electric steam automobiles.—Bangor (Me.) Letter in N. Y. who may often be seen with her brothers careering along the fine roads of Shanghai. There are not more than two or three Chinese girls who ride, though the sons of the wealthy Chinese merchants and many other Chinese youths may often be seen riding in the streets of the treaty ports, the only places in China where riding is possible. On the whole, the Chinese have taken kindly to the "bike" and many are expert trick riders. The lady referred to is a Miss Kit-Sen, of Shanghai, and was the first girl in China to cycle. She evidently enjoys the sport.

Adjustment of Bearings.

When a bearing is either too loose or too tight, the machine not only runs badly, but the wear is greater. If the wheel shakes sideways in the forks, the bearing is too loose, and if, when spun, it stops abruptly, it is too tight. There is one point which should be remembered. The bearing may be exactly right before the nut at the end of the axle is tightened, but often when the nut is tightened up it has the effect of tightening the bearing also; consequently, the wheel should be spun after as well as before this nut is screwed home. If the wheel does not spin freely, then the nut will have to be unscrewed and the adjusting cone given about half a turn back.

NEW TIRE INFLATOR.

A Canadian Invention Which May Prove to Be the Thing Wheelmen Have Long Sought.

A number of automatic tire inflators have already been patented and placed on the market, but the majority of them are somewhat clumsy affairs, which are both unsightly on the bicycle and heavy enough to increase the weight of the wheel perceptibly. The device which we show in the cut has just been patented by Thomas H. McCauley, of Port Arthur, Can., and has a number of good points to recommend it. In the first place, it is entirely out of sight, the exposed portion taking the place of the ordinary valve, which latter it resembles. When the tire is formed an oval elastic shell is inserted, as shown. This shell has an intake through the spring valve, and as the valve closes against the return current of air its only means of escape when the section of tire reaches the lowest point of its circuit and is compressed by the weight of the rider is through the slotted tip of the oval shell. As soon as the pressure is removed from the oval it again expands, drawing a fresh supply of air through the valve. This pumping operation will continue until the tire becomes inflated to a sufficient degree to overcome the rider's weight and stop the contraction and expansion of the oval shell. —Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

APPLYING THE BRAKE.

A Subject Which Has Interested Wheelmen More Than Any Other of Last Year's Problems.

With the increasing interest in coaster brakes has naturally arisen a renewal of the perennial discussion as to the best place for applying the brake. At present there may be said to be five different answers to the question, all of which are under practical tests. The brake is applied (1) to the tire; (2) to the rim of the wheel; (3) to the inside of a small rim attached to the hub; (4) to the outside of such a rim; (5) by compressing the hub endwise. The list clearly comprises only two classes of brake which differ essentially in anything except details. By the first and second methods the brake pressure is applied to the rapidly-moving parts of the wheel. By methods 3, 4 and 5 the pressure is applied to the slowly-moving parts near the axle. It follows necessarily that the actual pressure used must be very much greater in the latter class. A moment's reflection shows that, given equal friction per pound of pressure between the surface in contact, a brake of one pound on a tire produces the same effect as a pressure of 14 pounds on the inside surface of a rim two inches in diameter. This is a fact of vital importance. For it follows that the pressure necessary to control a bicycle by means of any known form of hub brake is sometimes enormous. We do not refer to the effort of the rider, of course, but to the result of that effort when transmitted to the braking surfaces in contact. There is a limit to the strength of materials; and it is no wonder that most hub brakes are liable to derangement by breakages and rapid wear of parts. The tendency of the operation of such devices to strain spokes beyond safe limits and to throw wheels out of true, is also obvious. All these difficulties are avoided when the brake pressure is applied to the outside of the wheel, to the tire, or to the rim. The actual pressure on the tire or rim is relatively very slight. The wheel is subjected to no abnormal strain, and the operating parts are easily made adequate to their various duties.—Golden Days.

Advantages of the Tandem.

The tandem is fast and will carry a pair of average riders many more miles in a day than they could possibly cover by the aid of single mounts. The tandem, says the Columbia, fosters certain mortal virtues inasmuch as the pair of riders must be brought to agreement with respect to route, speed and choice of seat, something which demands the cultivation of courtesy, forbearance and deference to the opinion of another. A great many riders have had occasion to realize with satisfaction that there is such a thing as judicious tandem companionships. When the occupants of the machine are self-chosen friends and when the object in riding is sociability rather than to cover a given distance in the shortest period of time, tandeming becomes a high exponent of the pleasure of cycling.

A CRY FOR HELP.

Result of a Prompt Reply.—Two Letters from Mrs. Watson, Published by Special Permission.—For Women's Eyes Only.

March 15, 1899.

To MRS. PINKHAM, LYNN, MASS.:

"DEAR MADAM:—I am suffering from inflammation of the ovaries and womb, and have been for eighteen months. I have a continual pain and soreness in my back and side. I am only free from pain when lying down, or sitting in an easy chair. When I stand I suffer with severe pain in my side and back. I believe my troubles were caused by over work and lifting some years ago.

"Life is a drag to me, and I sometimes feel like giving up ever being a well woman; have become careless and unconcerned about everything. I am in bed now. I have had several doctors, but they did me but little good.

"Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been recommended to me by a friend, and I have made up my mind to give it a fair trial.

"I write this letter with the hope of hearing from you in regard to my case."—MRS. S. J. WATSON, Hampton, Va.

November 27, 1899.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I feel it my duty to acknowledge to you the benefit that your advice and Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound have done for me.

"I had been suffering with female troubles for some time, could walk but a short distance, had terrible bearing down pains in lower part of my bowels, backache, and pain in ovary. I used your medicine for four months and was so much better that I could walk three times the distance that I could before.

"I am to-day in better health than I have been for more than two years, and I know it is all due to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

RIGDON'S MONUMENT.

Spent a Lifetime in Building It and Finally Filled a Pauper's Grave.

"Jonathan Rigdon died very poor, didn't he, deacon?" I said.

"Yes, they buried him in a pauper's grave. Poor Rigdon! And he had a big heart," said the deacon. "He spent his whole life and a big fortune building a monument to another man."

"Was the monument ever finished, deacon?"

"Yes, and Jonathan did it."

"How?"

"Well," said the deacon, sadly, "Jonathan commenced it early. He commenced putting money into the monument at 17 and finished it at 50."

"And he gave his whole time to it?"

"Yes, he worked night and day, often all night long, and on the Sabbath. He seemed to be in a hurry to get it done. He put all the money he earned upon it—some say $500,000. Then he borrowed all he could; and when no one would loan him any more he would take his wife's dresses and bedclothes and many other valuable things in his home and sell them to get more money to finish the monument."

"How self-sacrificing!"

"Yes, Jonathan sacrificed everything for this monument," said the deacon. "He came home one day and was about to take the blanket that lay over his sleeping baby, and his wife tried to stop him; but he drew back his fist and knocked her down, and then away with the blankets and never brought them back, and the poor baby sickened and died from the exposure. At last there was nothing left in the house. The poor heart-broken wife soon followed the baby to the grave. Yet Jonathan kept working all the more at the monument. I saw him when he was about 50 years old. The monument was nearly done; but he had worked so at it that I hardly knew him, he was so worn; his clothes were all in tatters, his face and nose were terribly swollen. And the wretched man had been so little in good society all the while that he was building that he had about forgotten how to use the English language; his tongue had some way become very thick, and when he tried to speak out would come an oath."

HE GAVE HIS WHOLE TIME TO IT.

"But the good man did finally accomplish the work?" I said.

"Yes, he finished it," said the deacon, his eyes moistening with tears.

"Oh, I should like to see it," I said.

"Come with me," said my informant, sadly, "and I will show it to you. It stands in a beautiful part of the city where five streets meet. Most men put such things in a cemetery. But John had his own way and put it in one of the fiuest lots to be found."

"Does it look like Grant's monument?"

"Yes, it's a good deal like Grant's monument. It is a grand house. There it is—look at it!" said the deacon, pointing to a beautiful mansion. "See! it is hgh and large, with great walls and fireplaces, and such velvet carpets, and, oh, what mirrors! Isn't it rich and grand?"

"And who lives in it, deacon?"

"Why, the man who sold Jonathan Rigdon nearly all the whisky he drank. He lives there with his family, and they wear the richest, finest clothes, and—"

"And poor Jonathan?"

"Why he's in the pauper's graveyard. Alas!" sighed the deacon, "the world is full of such monuments built by poor drunkards who broke the hearts of devoted wives and starved sweet children to do it."—New Voce.

His Finished Work.

A man who had come down through drink and had just been let out of prison told a friend whom he met that he had just arrived at a conclusion. He said:

"A good tailor will always put the best-made coat in his shop window, won't he?"

"Yes," said the friend.

"The shoemaker always puts the best shoes in the window for advertisement. But you never see a publican put a sample of his work in the window; he's got more sense."

He was right, too. The finished work of a publican is nothing to boast about, and he knows it!

THE RUM TRAFFIC.

A Strong Arraignment of the Infamous Business by the New York Tribune.

A trade which flourishes upon the ruins of its supporters, which derives its revenues from its plunder of homes and from the defrauding of helpless childhood, from the degradation of manhood; which requires for its prosperity the injury of the community; which ministers to every vile and vicious passion and propensity, which makes drunkards, and thieves, and embezzlers, and gamblers, and wife-beaters, and murderers; which brutalizes and degrades all who are brought in contact with it, cannot claim the respect, and assuredly ought not to be able to claim the encouragement of the community.

It indeed indicates the extent of the prevalent demoralization that a business so inherently infamous, so unquestionably against public policy, should have been permitted to establish itself so firmly that those who pursue it are convinced, not only that it is legitimate, but that it is "entitled to protection and respect."

But upon what ground do these bold claims rest?

What constitutes a legitimate, respectable business?

Is a business which debauches, impoverishes and injures the public, either the one or the other?

When such questions have to be asked it is time that they were settled definitely.

At present rum selling is technically legitimate.

That is to say, it is not unlawful.

But since its consequences are what we see, it would be an abuse of language to term it respectable.

But it does not stop at those insolent pretensions.

It tells the people it has the political powers, that it is organized, and that it will fight reform and temperance with the votes of the unfortunates it has imbruted.

This, then, is what the community has to face.

It must either submit to the political supremacy of the rum sellers, it must either accept their government, it must either bow to their standard of morals and declare them to be entitled to "protection and respect," or it must make up its mind to a conflict, the aim and end of which shall be the overthrow of this abominable abuse, and the protection of the masses against the worst foe of civilization.

They will oppose any reform whatever.

They deny the right of the people to protect themselves at all.

They claim the right for themselves to poison and brutalize and degrade all whom they can reach.

They think they will be supported in this by the public they fleece and injure, and upon the persistence of whose animal appetites they coarsely ejaculate.

Hitherto they had unhappily been justified in this dependence.

The men who had most cause to loathe the business have been among the first to uphold and fortify it.

But a change is even now passing over public opinion.

It is becoming more and more generally recognized that intemperance is at the bottom of two-thirds of the social, political and moral evils that retard progress, and perplex and harass the legislator.

It is being comprehended that an effective franchise requires sobriety and intelligence in the voter.

In fact, it is being realized that the future of the country depends largely upon mastering the elements which have their origin in and derive all their strength from rum, and which militate at every turn against good government, pure social conditions, religion and progress.—N. Y. Tribune.

Son Sends Father to Cell.

David Vollinger, of No. 906 Second avenue, with a policeman's aid, the other night forced his 64-year-old father to go to the East Fifty-fifth street police station, and there had the old man put behind the bars.

"I have supported him at my home for 12 years," the son said, his eyes full of tears, "and whenever he got hold of any money he got drunk and abused my wife and children. This afternoon he collected a laundry bill for my wife and came home intoxicated, beat my wife and children and smashed the furniture. It breaks my heart to send him away, but he is destroying my home, and I have to do it."

All the way to the station the old man had pleaded for mercy. The son had only cried silently and said nothing till he addressed the sergeant. The father, finding his appeal for pity of no avail, became abusive as he was led away to a cell.—N. Y. World.

The Chinese have an elaborate system of treament which utilizes this idea.

BOGUS SNAP-SHOTS.

Pictures of Wild Animals That Have Been Taken Without Incurring Any Danger.

One of the developments of the modern art of "faking" is the manufacture of bogus photographs of wild animals which are supposed to have been taken under circumstances of extreme difficulty. In fact, no kind of photography is quite so difficult as this, because the beasts and birds of the forest must be approached very closely in order to make their portraits large enough on the plate, says the Saturday Evening Post.

It is all very easy, however, for the ingenious fakir, who makes his snap-shots by daylight in a zoological park, the negatives or prints being afterward touched up in such a way as to eliminate any suggestions of wire fences or other accessories of the outdoor menagerie. Having got his pictures, he labels them in a suitable manner, and writes an article to go with them, describing the extraordinary adventures and hairbreadth escapes which he encountered on a trip through the wilderness, during which the portraits of these "wild" and often ferocious creatures were taken.

Only a short time ago a fakir of this kind obtained from the superintendent of the New York Zoological park a number of excellent snap-shot pictures of animals in the collection there, which had been taken by the superintendent's own photographer. To supplement these he secured a number of other photographs, similar in character, from the Zoological park in Washington. Then he exhibited the entire lot as having been taken out in the wilds. For example, a bear in the Zoological park at Washington was located in the Maine woods, and a dear old billy-goat, beloved of Washington children, was described as desperate and wild.

With the pictures he gave a very exciting description of his experiences as an artist-hunter in securing these marvelous snap-shots.

This is only one form of a species of fraud that has become popular of late. One ingenious individual, who narrowly escaped prosecution awhile ago for counterfeiting eggs and selling the bogus specimens to museums and private collectors, has recently turned up with exquisitely life-like photographs of birds, which in reality are produced by the help of stuffed specimens artistically attitudinized with wires.

Really Too Bad.

The fair young society lady was in an agitated frame of mind when she returned from a shopping expedition the other day.

"Why, Dorothy, what in the world is the matter?" asked her indulgent husband, who read distress in her pretty face.

"Oh, dear," she said, her voice trembling with emotion, "I've lost the receipt for my new hat."

"Well," the husband replied, "it is very easy to go back to the store and get another receipt. I don't see why you should let a little matter like that worry you."

"It isn't that," was the sobbing reply, "but I'm afraid that some one we know will find that receipt and learn how much I paid for it."—Detroit Free Press.

BOYS MANAGE MINE.

Youths of Tender Years Conduct a Mining Enterprise with a Great Big Name.

In the Cripple Creek district near Anaconda is the smallest gold mine in the world and its owners and operators are the smallest persons on earth engaged in the pursuit of mining. It is owned by the Yellow Kid Gold Mining company and is capitalized at 30 cents. It is controlled by the O'Brien brothers, three in number, and as a miniature project is one of the most important and interesting in the district.

Dan O'Brien, five years old, is the engineer and president of the company. His bland countenance can be seen in the accompanying illustration, peering out of the "Yellow Kid" shafthouse, which is just four feet in height. He is full of original ideas, which he carries out with enthusiasm.

Bart O'Brien, boss ore sorter and treasurer of the company, is nine years old. His position as ore sorter was given him by reason of his superior knowledge of mineral. He is seen at work in the illustration at the ore bins of the "Yellow Kid," which consists of soap boxes.

John O'Brien is the "head push" and general superintendent of the company. In the illustration he is seen doing the duties of "top man." When not thus employed he works in the shaft, which is now down 25 feet and has three levels.

The three O'Brien boys built the entire plant of the "Yellow Kid" unaided, taking as their model the Morning Glory mine, just above them on the hill. The entire equipment, gallows frame, ore cars, buckets, bins, screens, dump, bell signals, shafthouse, tools and implements are exactly like those of the big mines of the district. Their father is the superintendent of the Morning Glory and although they imitate him in some respects the development of the "Yellow Kid" mine is being carried out on original ideas. The three young miners live in the neat frame cabin shown in the picture, where they retire each night after a hard day's work. The "Yellow Kid" mine does not indulge in any night or graveyard shifts, for the entire force puts in 12 hours of peaceful slumber that only comes to clear conscience and tired muscles. It is the ambition of the O'Brien boys to succeed their father in the management of the Morning Glory mine and they are rapidly equipping themselves for this serious duty.

Moses E. Clapp's career has been closely interwoven with the politics of Minnesota for 20 years. He came to Minnesota in 1880, and first gained prominence as the champion of Senator Nelson in his first candidacy for congress. He was one of the earlier supporters of Senator Davis, and in 1886 he entered politics officially as attorney general of the state. He was reelected in 1888 and in 1890. In 1896 Mr. Clapp became a republican candidate for governor, but was defeated by Col. Clough. Since then he has taken little part in politics aside from his campaign speeches. During the last campaign he paid particular attention to state affairs and is credited more than any other man with the defeat of Gov. Lind. He is one of the leading attorneys of the state and has an enviable record.

A MORAL TALE.

There was once a boy in Kalamazoo
Who used to insist that he never would do
The things he was told he had got to;
But of contrary mind would persistently fly
In authority's face, and was minded to try
The things that his mother said not to.

Now hold your ears hard, lest it happen you rue
(As once did the boy from Kalamazoo),
Such a high handed way with the mater!
And hark to the fate of this boy who'd rebel,
For his lachrymal glands had occasion to well
As he shouted in vain for his pater.

His mother had told him, as mother tells you
(For mothers, though here or in Kalamazoo,
Are very much like one another),
That when it grew chill on a November morn
His thick winter overcoat had to be worn.
And the boy with a scowl said: "Oh, bother!"

And then, unobserved, the boy took his cue,
This bad boy I speak of from Kalamazoo,
And slipped out of doors quite uncoated;
And thought himself clever and shouted in glee;
His morals, alas! so elastic could be,
I regret that they have to be noted.

Now it chanced on that day, with much hullabaloo,
A bear had come down into Kalamazoo,
And the town in affright had stampeded.
But the boy knew it not, and when in the street
He met with Sir Bruin he couldn't retreat—
His legs weren't sufficiently speeded.

"My boy, you look cold! Your clothes are too few,"
Said this bear, with a wink, in Kalamazoo;
"Now isn't my coat better suited?
No overcoat on! Now I really opine
You'd find it more comfortable inside of mine;"
And this statement was never refuted.

And now I have told all that ever I knew
Of the boy and the bear and Kalamazoo,
For I never have heard how it ended.
So let us all hope that the boy disagreed,
And his pater, who found him no worse off than treed,
Also found that his ways had been mended.

QUEER LITTLE PEOPLE.

They Have Cozy Underground Villages and Their Capital Is Called Ant Town.

The cities where the little people live are down under the ground. Each city is like one great house with lots of rooms. There are nurseries for the babies, storerooms where the food is packed away, living rooms and long galleries leading from one part of the town to another, and up to the top of the ground. There are even little cow sheds, where the tiny cows live in winter.

Some of the little people are black, some are red and others brown. Go out in the field and lift up a large, flat stone and you will find the gateway to one of these cities.

The ants, as we call these little folk, will hurry about and each one will take one of the white cocoons that look like grains of rice, and run down into the house with it, as fast as possible. Then she will come back for another, and pretty soon there will be nothing left where you turned over the stone by the narrow roadway, leading down to Ant Town.

The ants are very busy workers, and when you see a little heap of dirt in the path you know that they have been making a new room or digging out a new roadway, and this is the earth they have brought up while they worked.

There are a great many different kinds of ant folks. In some cities the masters and mistresses are very lazy, because they keep slaves to do all the work.

"It is so warm and sunny to-day we must bring up the babies for an airing," said one ant slave to another, as they met in one of the halls.

"You bring them up if you want to, but I have too much to do. First I must go with my sister slaves and find food for breakfast. Then we must feed our masters and mistresses, and afterward go out and harvest the grass seed for winter." So they hurried along and the first brought the babies up to the warm, dry chamber near the top of the ground.

The ant cows are tiny green bugs, such as we often see on our house plants. Their milk is like honey, and the ants are very fond of it. The ants know that these little cows would die when the weather grew cold if no one looked after them; so when fall comes they drive them into the cow sheds they have made, and feed them all winter, the same as we do our cows.—Orange Judd Farmer.

Didn't Dare.

"No," said Mr. Erastus Pinkley, "I never wears gloves."

"I has noticed dat yoh han's ain't got de style on 'em," rejoined Miss Miami Brown.

"Tain' no lack o' style. I dasn' w'ar 'em on account o' de police. Ef I was ter kivver dem han's wif gloves I'd be arrested inside o' two days foh kyahyin' concealed weapons."—Washington Star.

THE RURAL POSTMAN.

He Works Hard for Small Pay, But Enjoys Life and Is Welcome Wherever He Goes.

If you like driving 22 or 23 miles a day in all kinds of weather, this is the very thing you want. To be sure you will have to furnish your own horse and cart out of a salary of $500 a year, but if you can be satisfied with a chariot like the one in the picture, that item will not be likely to cut a large hole in your income.

This particular man is a Pennsylvania mail-carrier. At nine o'clock every morning, except Sunday, he starts out from the village post office and all day long he is driving about the country delivering and collecting mails. His route follows the main roads, but branches out now and then to this side or that, in order to reach some district where a number of families are clustered together. In one place he makes a trip of three miles to reach a group of homes, coming back to the main road not over 500 yards from the point where he left it. Every house has a mail box near the roadside, where the carrier can reach it without getting out of his cart. Sometimes, where several families live at a distance from the road, half a dozen boxes, each marked with its owner's name, will be found nailed to the side of a convenient barn and here the carrier leaves the mail and the farmers come each day to find their letters and papers just as safe as if they had hitched up and driven some two or three miles to the post office after them.

There is no end of variety in these rural boxes. Some of them are carefully made and painted, but more of them seem to be simply the first thing that happened to come to hand. There are tin cans and soap boxes, cracker boxes, cigar boxes; and one man could find nothing better than a piece of stove pipe which he nailed to a tree, so high that the carrier can just reach it by standing up in his cart. The owner of this box has to come on horseback to get his mail or else bring a ladder. Another box is a gourd with a hole cut in one side, and hung from the limb of a tree.

Besides all these, there are a number of Uncle Sam's own iron boxes, placed by the government along the country roads and from these the carrier collects mail each day just as it is done in the city.

There is a great advantage about the life of a rural delivery man. He is always welcome wherever he goes. At nearly every house along his route some one is watching for him to appear with his bag of letters and papers. He hasn't much time to stop, but each one has a word for him and he is generally loaded up with a choice assortment of messages from house to house all along the way. On the whole, when it doesn't hail or rain or freeze too hard, the rural deliveryman must have a fairly good time jogging over his route.—Little Chronicle.

GOOD WINTER GAMES.

There Are Many That Will Help to Make Fun and Enliven an Otherwise Dull Party.

We all know very many games to play; the trouble is to think of them at the right minute. If you are going to give a candy pull or a cobweb party it is well to have a good many games thought up beforehand, alternating the romping games with the quieter ones in a little programme so that there may be no awkward pauses.

Have you ever been to a "swap" party? Each one is supplied with four or five little bundles, wrapped so that no one else can suspect the contents. The bundles may contain anything from a tinsel ball to a sunbonnet. Each one praises up his own property, without telling what it is, and the swapping is carried on with great show of bargaining. When everyone has swapped the parcels are opened and the one who has made the poorest swaps must tell a story or suggest a game, or in some way entertain the company. After this come other games, with apples and nuts for refreshments.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Mouse Killed by a Ring.

A lady suddenly missed a valuable diamond ring from her finger, and all that she could remember was that she had recently washed her hands. Fearing it had slipped off in the operation, a plumber was called in, and all the traps opened, with the hope of finding the jewel, but without avail. Some time later the set bowl in the bathroom had to be replaced, and when it was removed, lo and behold, crowded in behind the water pipe was the skeleton of a mouse, and around the neck hung a diamond ring. The mystery was then quickly cleared up. The poor little cerature had feasted on a box of bran, which the lady used to whiten her hands, and into which she dropped the ring. By accident, probably, the mouse slipped its head through the ring, and then fled in alarm. In passing between the pipes the ring was caught and pinched the mouse's neck, and so it died.

Newspaper Frauds.

"Non-partisan" papers, edited by partisans, are the most patent humbugs of the age. In commenting upon public matters they start out non-partisan, but wind up partisan. They are simply frauds. A partisan paper is the more to be admired. It sacrafices patronage for principle. It is more honest, for it does not play for both sides, and does not pretend to be anything than partisan. There is nothing antagonistic to honesty in being partisan, and there is every inducement to dishonesty in being non-partisan or independent. The most despicable object is a partisan who pretends to conduct a non-partisan or independent paper, and then by his acts endorses every principle and policy which his party espouses.—Westminster (Md.) Advocate.

IF John Walter Smith could not read or write what would be his opinion of a Governor that would call an extra session of the legislature for the purpose of disfranchising him?

TO THOSE who are acquainted with Democratic election methods in Worcester county, what Governor Smith says about stamping out bribery at the polls, is enough to make peach trees bloom in mid-winter.

FOR OVER a hundred years the people of the State of Maryland have enjoyed the right to vote without educational or property qualification. Now, at the beginning of the twentieth century the Democratic party proposes to humiliate and deprive them of their sovereignty.

Governor Smith's Extra Session Call.

That long promised but repeatedly delayed call for an extra session of the General Assembly has at last made its appearance and will be found in another column. It is accompanied by a letter addressed "to the people of Maryland," in which Governor Smith ostensibly sets forth his reasons for issuing the call. In reality, however, it is a plea of justification carefully elaborated to bolster up a bad cause.

For weeks His Excellency had put off all inquirers who desired to know whether an extra session would be called with the answer that he had not yet made up his mind, and that before coming to a conclusion he desired to ascertain fully and unmistakably the state of public sentiment on the subject. The letter, however, bears all the ear marks of elaboration and painstaking revision. It must have been long in preparation, and suggests pointedly that the delay in issuing the call was due less to any indecision on the Governor's part than to a paucity of substantial and convincing argument in support of the contemplated assault on free and unrestricted suffrage.

Mr. Smith's labored defense will deceive no one. Neither the reference to the "diligent and extensive inquiry" that he claims to have instituted in order to learn the views of citizens, nor the artfully worded presentation of the alleged reasons which, in his opinion, render an extra session imperative, can dissipate, or weaken in the slightest degree the widespread belief that the action taken is prompted by notoriously partisan motives and is designed to promote offensively partisan purposes.

The Governor, after a stilted and high flown preface, in which he claims to be actuated by the most patriotic and elevated impulses, and asserts that he is rendering obedience to a popular mandate, proceeds to outline the program which will be laid before the General Assembly. The latter is to provide for a new enumeration of the population of Maryland as a means of correcting the "palpable errors and dangerous and unjust results in certain of the counties under the recent Federal census," and to supply a basis for a fair and just reapportionment; to pass a new election law in order to remedy such pretended evils as the exercise of the suffrage by "many thousands of voters not bone fide residents of the State," who "are permitted to register and go to the polls, and by their votes materially influence, and in some quarters absolutely control. the votes of our resident population;" to suppress bribery at elections, and to pass an enabling act authorizing the city of Baltimore to provide, without further delay, an adequate sewerage system.

Governor Smith's excuses—the document accompanying the call can hardly be designated by any other name—are lame and singularly cowardly. People were prepared for buncombe about the sewerage and the State census, but they thought that the Governor would attempt some explanation of the disfranchisement scheme by which the bosses hope to put Gorman and his spoilsmen in power again.

The Governor does not even dare to mention the illiterates. "The purity and secrecy of the ballot" can be accomplished, he assures us, "without interference with the legal rights of any voter."

When the gang passes the measure that is to destroy universal suffrage in this State these words should cut in derision on the tombstone that will mark Governer Smith's political grave. After weeks of silent plotting, in which a few of the bolder partisans had the courage to say something about negro domination and the dangers of the illiterate vote, the Governor suddenly does as he is bid, but lacks the moral courage to use his bosses' arguments.

As early as January 22 it was announced that an extra session would be called. The plan then formulated lacked not a single essential detail of the proposal now so unctuously paraded as an inspiration from the people. Did hypocrisy ever affect the habiliments of virtue with greater show of audacity, and was ever public official more obedient to the behests of a discredited clique of ringsters? If so, the political history of Maryland fails to show it.

The Lazy Man.

A lazy man is always good-natured. He never flies into a passion. He might crawl into one, if that were possible; but the idea of his flying into one is preposterous. Who ever heard of a lazy man breaking into a bank where a crowbar had to be used, or drilling into a safe? Not but that he might covet his neighbors' goods contained therein, but the horror of handling a crowbar and drills would always deter him from actually committing burglary. He never runs away with his neighbor's wife, simply on account of the horror he has of running. If he is ever known to run it is to run to—seed. He rarely lies about his neighbors, for it would be too much exertion; but he lies about a bar room all day. He is of inestimable service to a billiard saloon, keeping the chairs warm and watching the game, for few would care to play where there are no spectators. The fact that he does this without pay, day in and day out, shows the unselfishness of his nature. The lazy man never gets up revolutions, insurrections or other popular excitement and don't make a nuisance of himself by training around the country making incendiary speeches to promote public discontent. In his own neighborhood he is never a busybody in other people's affairs, for the very idea of being a busybody at anything would drive him out of his head. No lazy man ever ran mad. If he went crazy it was because he couldn't go anywhere else without walking. Lazy men don't disturb the quiet of peaceful neighbors by putting up factories, furnaces and other abominations.

Bloomington.

Mrs. N. C. Gutherie, mother of Rev. Charles Gutherie, of Baltimore, who has been visiting Mr. and Mrs. E. Kemp for the past two months, left for Terra Alta Wednesday morning to spend a short time with her sister, Mrs. Jones, before returning to Baltimore.

Messrs. Os Bros., who have been operating a saw mill near Swanton, are completing arrangements to go out of the business early in the spring. The stock in the store at the mill is being disposed of as rapidly as possible and all broken packages remaining will be sold at wholesale prices. One of the brothers has purchased a farm of 150 acres some ten or twelve miles east of Cumberland and will devote his time in the future to agricultural pursuits.

The mines in this vicinity are running on short time. The big vein and gas coal average about half time while the small veins, six feet and four feet, have been running about two days a week. Scarcity of orders and market overstotked are the causes alleged.

The ice houses about town have all been filled during the past week. Mr. George Warnick took advantage of the fine ice on deep hole, Savage river, and put away about two car loads of ten inch ice. The Brydon ice house was filled with ice from Luke and Mr. Miller received his supply from Mt. Lake Park.

A man by the name of Fausnaught while riding his bicycle between Piedmont and Keyser on last Monday dropped dead from heart disease.

Mrs. Pearce Reed, living on Dry Fork about six or eight miles from Crab Tree station, died on last Friday from the effects of burns received about three weeks prior. She was sitting in front of the stove feeding her babe when her attention was attracted by the smell of smoke and looking down noticed that her little four-year-old boy, playing with a burning stick, had set fire to her dress. She became excited, threw here babe on the bed, ran out of doors and started for the home of her mother, a short distance away. She was soon enveloped in flames and before she arrived at her mother's her hips, back and legs were terribly burned. She leaves a husband and three small children. She was buried last Monday morning, Rev. Howard, of this place, officiating.

The "big" meeting in the M. E. church, which is now in its eighth week, is still going on and sinners are getting very scarce.

Mr. Will Barnard, the late nominee on the Democratic ticket for county commissioner, is receiving bids for the erection of a commodious dwelling near the county road, opposite the old Barnard homestead. Work will be commenced in the spring and he wants to have his home completed by early summer.

GOVERNMENT ROAD WORK.

What is Being Done to Stimulate Highway Improvement.

The good roads question is today the subject of a vast agitation begun first by wheelmen, taken up by the government and now a matter of legislative consideration the country over. As a result ten States have exhibits at the present universal exposition in Paris illustrating how perfect roads ought to be built. This from a country that still has in part the worst roads in the world is rather daring, but it is also an indication of what is being done. The ten States in question know what they are talking about. They had the worst roads and now they have—or at least they are constructing—the best.

It will be a matter of news to many to learn that the United States government has gone into the road question in the most energetic and thorough manner imaginable, and having, through the department of agriculture, studied what constitutes a good road and why good roads are needed, has gone to work to spread the information and teach the people.

It has experiment stations in every State in the Union, where lessons in road making are taught. Hundreds of pamphlets showing just how a good road is constructed and how it may be preserved have been published by the government and may be had for the asking. Object lessons in road building are given annually in every State in the Union, when in some worst sections a quarter or half, or even a mile, of excellent roadway is constructed, and the people show how and why it ought to be done. These object lessons, begun in 1894, have done more than anything else to start the great movement which is now furthering the construction of perfect roads the land over.

The government, in these exhibitions, ordinarily constructs three specimen roads—a modern macadam, a sand and an ordinary dirt road. When these roads are completed, a heavy farm wagon, loaded with produce, is drawn over each of them, and the amount of force required to haul it is determined by the use of a trackometer. This instrument is so constructed as to accurately regiter every pound the horses pull at every stage of the haul in plain view of those in its vicinity. It is made clear by these experiments that a team harnessed in the ordinary way is subject, under the best conditions, to a continuous jerking motion, which must, on even the smoothest country road, greatly increase its fatigue.

On a dirt road in bad condition this jerking becomes a succession of heavy blows transmitted to the team by means of a collar. They are cruelly painful, bruising the shoulders, harrassing and torturing the animals, constantly lessening their value as well as directly decreasing the amount of the load that it is possible to haul.

Piedmont Independent.

Rev. Mr. Thomas, of Mt. Savage, accompanied by his wife and son, was here the first of the week to assist Rev. Cecil in his protracted meeting, which is still going on and full of interest. Mr. Thomas was compelled to return to his charge on Wednesday, but expects to come back on Friday to further assist in the good work that is doing so much for the youth of our town.

Diphtheria is reported in the family of Joseph Buckee, living at the Mackie lumber mill, near Everett's Tunnell, this county.

Frank Young, of Hampshire, expects to move his family to Simpson on Saturday. He has secured work at that place and will be accompanied by Joe Shingler.

'Squire Moody, who has been confined to his room for the past week with rheumatism, following an attack of the grip, is gradually improving. Mrs. Thomas Burke, who has been quite ill with the same trouble, is able to move around her room.

The railroad cyclone in the shape of a derailed car that sidewiped the little home of Robert Morehead, at Empire, is causing him and his wife a great deal of inconvenience. The front porch was completely torn away and one portion of the building so twisted on its foundation that there is a hole two feet by eight feet in the roof where the front and back buildings join, more than ample for ventilation this zero weather. "Bob" was led to believe, at the time of the accident, that the railroad company would take great pleasure in restoring the house to the proper shape and promptly make all needed repairs. Up to this time nothing further has been said and no repairs of any kind been made, and his confidence in the promises of certain railroad employes is somewhat shaken and he is now after legal redress.

The trackmen on the W. Va. C. & P. R. R. have been reduced to two days per week for this month.

Our postmistress, Mrs. Fannie Bartlett, was compelled to forego duty for a few days this week on account of sickness.

Thursday was pay day at the mines in this neighborhood. We heard no one say he was sorry.

The two children of Widow Phares, of Hampshire, who have been quite sick with pneumonia, are much better.

Joseph Changere, a Hungarian, who had been stopping with Frank Young, of Hampshire, since last October suffering with consumption, and who, because he had no relatives to take care of him and no money for medical attention and board, was sent to the poor farm ten or twelve days ago, died at that institution last week.

It is said by a great many people that West Virginia never hangs a criminal. There are 18 now in the State under sentence of death and we shall soon see how many of these soothsayers belong to the Tom Pepper brigade, and how many criminals get it where the chicken got the axe.

Mrs. Sallie Spicer, of Grantsville, is visiting her brother, Samuel Harshbarger.

Miss Louise Ravenscroft, of Westernport, accompanied Miss Hallie Barnard home on last Saturday and will spend a few days as her guest.

Capt. Oscar Abernathy, a prominent young Republican of Hampshire, and well known during the late presidential campaign as an officer in the Rough Riders Marching Club of Savage, is quite sick with grip and its complications at the residence of Mr. Foy on Hampshire Hill, where he is boarding.

Hoffman Bros. have received their saw mill and will soon be ready for business.

That Cough Hangs On

You have used all sorts of cough remedies but it does not yield; it is too deep seated. It may wear itself out in time, but it is more liable to produce la grippe, pneumonia or a serious throat affection. You need something that will give you strength and build up the body.

SCOTT'S EMULSION

will do this when everything else fails. There is no doubt about it. It nourishes, strengthens, builds up and makes the body strong and healthy, not only to throw off this hard cough, but to fortify the system against further attacks. If you are run down or emaciated you should certainly take this nourishing food medicine.

Farmers are up against a new bunco game. They sign what they believe to be an order for a gold watch, which they are to receive free, or at a nominal price, and the signature turns up at the bottom of a promisory note. It is the old story. The man who expects to get something for nothing is likely to get swindled.

The heavy fall of snow last week made excellent sledding, much to the delight of farmers and teamsters who are engaged in hauling limestone, lumber, etc. The railroad yards at Oakland are stacked to overflowing with timber and staves, as high as twenty-five teams coming into town a day with the product of the numerous mills in this section.

Friday, Washington's Birthday, will be a holiday in the public schools and all branches of public service, including the banks, postoffices, etc. In some of the schools interesting exercises will be held in honor of the Father of His Country and many incidents in the noble life led by Washington will be related. These affairs are instructive and in many cases the moral set by the life of Washington is an example which goes on for life with the children. Aside from this they learn more about men and the affairs of men than in any other way.

One of the best known manufacturers in the United States who started into business with a small capital and whose yearly sales now amount to over $3,000,000 says that "the main thing in the line of success is to keep yourself and your goods constantly before the public. This is best done by means of advertising in general, and particularly by newspaper advertising." As advertising has enabled this man to keep a great factory in constant operation and to conduct seventy-two retail stores, what he says on the subject of publicity is entitled to some consideration.

The statement of the condition of the First National Bank is given elsewhere in this issue. The volume of business transacted by the bank is very satisfactory to those interested.

Mr. Charles D. Smith, who has been in the employ of the Garrett County Bank for some months, will resign his position about June 1st and locate in the State of West Virginia for the practice of law. The position thus made vacant has been offered Mr. James C. Peddicord, of Oakland.

The time locks and interior workings of the Corliss safe in the Garrett County Bank underwent an overhauling at the hands of an expert from the factory yesterday. This is done at stated intervals with all safes of this character to more fully insure the accurate working of the delicate mechanism contained in them.

Advertisements calling for recruits for the regular army are posted in the postoffice but so far none have gone from here to enlist. They will hardly go at all as any young man in as fine condition as the recruits are required to be can make so much or more by remaining at home than he can in the army.

The discovery of what was at first pronounced itch among the pupils of the Terra Alta school, followed later by the discovery of genuine hard shelled "gray backs," leads one to remark that a building once occupied by a camp of sun-tanned sons of Italy is never of much account any more and ought to be burned to the ground.—Kingwood Argus.

Regulations for Lent were read out in the Catholic churches Sunday. They do not differ materially from those in past years. For some time, by an indult, working people among Catholics have been permitted to eat meat once a day on all fast days in the week with certain exceptions instead of, as formerly, abstaining from it altogether. The exceptions are Good Friday, Ash Wednesday, the Wednesday and Saturday of Holy Writ. Persons in delicate health are not required to fast or even to strictly abstain, if their physical condition will not permit, but in lieu thereof all are expected to mortify the flesh in some other way. In the circulars read out Sunday special stress was laid upon the use of intoxicating liquors during Lent and those addicted to them were counseled to deny themselves at least during the penitential period.

Lenten Services.

In St. Matthew's church, Oakland, Lenten services will be held every Monday, Wednesday and Friday at 4.15 p. m. by the rector, Rev. W. H. Osmond.

Death of John Mellinger.

John Mellinger, formerly of Grantsville, who moved to Beckman, near Swanton, a year or more ago, where he became postmaster, died on Monday. Several weeks ago Mr. Mellinger was stricken with paralysis, his entire right being affected. He was over sixty years of age. His remains were taken to Cumberland and thence to Rockwood, Pa., for interment. He leaves besides his wife one son.

Death of an Infant.

Willard Wayne, aged about six months, son of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Butler, died on Sunday of spinal meningitis, after an illness of two weeks or more. The funeral took place yesterday, conducted by Rev. George I. Uhler, of St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church.

New Safe Received.

The new seven-ton Corliss safe for the First National Bank was delivered here Monday afternoon by the railroad company and on Tuesday morning it was unloaded and hauled to the bank building. The safe was taken from the car on a skidway and then set upon an improvised sled made of heavy oak planks upon which it was drawn through the streets by six horses. The manufacturers of the safe had a representative here to superintend the work which was accomplished in a comparatively short time. Since its installation in the bank building it has been examined and greatly admired by many people.

Found Dead in Bed.

Mr. August Smith, an old resident of this county, living near Thayerville, died Tuesday night. His wife arose early Tuesday morning, and after attending to some household duties returned to the bedroom to awaken her husband, and calling him several times and receiving no reply she investigated the cause and to her astonishment found life to be extinct. Mr. Smith was the father-in-law of Mr. William Kahl, of near town.

There is no better alterative pill compounded. They will renovate and renew your whole system. Get them of your druggist or merchant or send 35 cents to the AHMISS HEALTH ALLIANCE, Mt. Death of Mrs. John Cornelius.

Died, at the Glades Hotel, in Oakland on Saturday last after an illness of several weeks, of Bright's disease with grip complications, Rebecca, beloved wife of John Cornelius and daughter of Giles and Sarah Easton, of Ohio. The deceased was born at Upton, Franklin county, Pa., January 1st, 1846, and was therefore aged a little more than 55 years.

On September 14, 1864, she became the wife of Mr. Cornelius, the marriage taking place near Perryburg, Ohio. From this union seven children were born—all daughters—all of whom survive the mother. They are Mrs. F. G. Hyde, Mrs. J. L. White, Mrs. James D. Hamill, Mrs. W. A. Boddy and Miss Kate Cornelius, of Oakland; Mrs. H. B. Ramsdell, of Rochester, N. Y., and Mrs. H. A. Paddock, of New York City. Mrs. Cornelius is also survived by her husband, her aged father and mother, two sisters, one brother and three grndchildren.

The deceased lady was a consistent member the Protestant Episcopal church, her remains being interred in the churchyard of St. Matthew's Tuesday afternoon after services having been conducted in the parlors of the hotel by the rector, Rev. W. H. Osmond. The pallbearers were Messrs. D. E. Offutt, S. T. Jones, G. S. Hamill, A. G. Sturgiss, J. M. Davis and E. H. Bartlett. The floral tributes sent by friends and relatives were exceedingly handsome and in profusion. These were borne to the grave by Messrs. W. R. Offutt, R. F. Bartlett and Bowie Johnson. One of the designs, a large cross of roses, carnations and lillies of the valley, came from Mr. Cornelius, a fitting tribute to the memory of his departed helpmeet.

Mrs. Cornelius' home life was one of unalloyed love toward her husband and children. She was in every sense a home woman, putting it far above everything else.

Church Matters.

At the congregational meeting of the membership of St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church held on Sunday morning after the preaching services, it was decided to sell the present parsonage and with the money received from that source to erect a new parsonage on the strip of ground south of the church and adjoining the property of G. H. Pritchard. The plans for the new building have already been drawn and accepted by the official board of the church. The parsonage will contain nine rooms and hallway. From the front hall direct communication with the church proper will be had through a door in the rear of the pulpit. Alterations in the interior of the church will also be made.

Value of the Local Newspaper.

A local newspaper reflects the business interests of the town in its advertising columns. A business man looking for a location always examines newspapers to see how his particular line is represented. If he is a druggist he concludes there are no druggists, or if there are, they are all dead. If he is a doctor or a lawyer, he looks over the professional cards to see if his profession is represented. Among the farmer subscribers the home paper has a similar mission. The prospective buyers like an invitation to come and trade with the merchants. A card of a professional man is just as essential as the sign in front of his door. It is not a question of being able to get along without it. A hardware man need not heat his stove to keep things from freezing. He might have a booth out on the street or a skating rink, and do a lot of business, instead of paying rent for a store and buying fuel to heat it with, but it might not be economy to do so. Advertising is not a luxury, but rather an economic proposition recognized by all the best and most successful business men the world over.

Hoyes.

The people generally have been making good use of the fine sledding and sleighing which we have had for the past few weeks and good prospects for plenty of more snow, according to the old adage, "If ground hog day is fair and clear we will have two winters this year."

Very few persons in our neighborhood have escaped whooping cough or grip this winter, but at this time we are glad to say all are getting better.

Mrs. Miller, wife of the late Timothy Miller, died at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Nelson McGettigan, on last Saturday evening. Interment at Flatwoods cemetery on Monday at 10.30 a. m.

Our school is still progressing very nicely with Prof. A. W. DeWitt as teacher.

The second quarterly meeting of the conference year was held at this place Saturday and Sunday last and was well attended. On Sunday Presiding Elder L. W. Roberts was present and preached several excellent sermons.

We are sorry to note the serious illness of Mrs. Thomas Bishoff at this writing. We hope for her recovery soon.

Mr. Daniel DeWitt's house, with nearly all its contents, was destroyed by fire on Tuesday of this week. The fire started from a stovepipe while the family was at dinner and they did not discover it until the whole roof was ablaze and were unable to save but a few pieces.

Mr. Adolphus Enlow, our horse jockey, says he is doing a booming business trading horses.

Mr. Abel DeWitt and family, of near Deer Park, was visiting Meshack Mattingly and W. A. Smith Sunday.

Prof. V. D. Miller is giving music lessons to several of our young people.

Mr. Joe Keller purchased a fine cutter a few days ago. Now, girls, you can look out, for some one will get a sleigh ride.

Mr. Wm. Sebold and family came down from Loch Lynn to attend the funeral of Mrs. Miller on Monday.

La Grippe Quickly Cured.

"In the winter of 1898 and 1899 I was taken down with a severe attack of what is called La Grippe," says F. L. Hewett, a prominent druggist of Winfield, Ill. "The only medicine I used was two bottles of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. It broke up the cold and stopped the coughing like magic, and I have never since been troubled with Grippe." Chamberlain's Cough Remedy can always be depended upon to break up a severe cold and ward off any threatened attack of pneumonia. It is pleasant to take, too, which makes it the most desirable and one of the most popular preparations in use for these ailments. For sale by all druggists.

Charles E. Headley, landlord of the Grafton Hotel, at Grafton, has been notified to vacate the premises by May 1st. It is the intention of the B. & O. to remove the hotel buildings and use the space for additional tracks, as every available foot of space is necessary for the increasing business of the road.

Farmers are up against a new bunco game. They sign what they believe to be an order for a gold watch, which they are to receive free, or at a nominal price, and the signature turns up at the bottom of a promisory note. It is the old story. The man who expects to get something for nothing is likely to get swindled.

The heavy fall of snow last week made excellent sledding, much to the delight of farmers and teamsters who are engaged in hauling limestone, lumber, etc. The railroad yards at Oakland are stacked to overflowing with timber and staves, as high as twenty-five teams coming into town a day with the product of the numerous mills in this section.

Friday, Washington's Birthday, will be a holiday in the public schools and all branches of public service, including the banks, postoffices, etc. In some of the schools interesting exercises will be held in honor of the Father of His Country and many incidents in the noble life led by Washington will be related. These affairs are instructive and in many cases the moral set by the life of Washington is an example which goes on for life with the children. Aside from this they learn more about men and the affairs of men than in any other way.

One of the best known manufacturers in the United States who started into business with a small capital and whose yearly sales now amount to over $3,000,000 says that "the main thing in the line of success is to keep yourself and your goods constantly before the public. This is best done by means of advertising in general, and particularly by newspaper advertising." As advertising has enabled this man to keep a great factory in constant operation and to conduct seventy-two retail stores, what he says on the subject of publicity is entitled to some consideration.

The statement of the condition of the First National Bank is given elsewhere in this issue. The volume of business transacted by the bank is very satisfactory to those interested.

Mr. and Mrs. Ramsdell, of Rochester, N. Y., and Mr. and Mrs. Paddock, of New York City, who came here owing to the death of their relative, Mrs. Cornelius, will remain a few weeks in Oakland.

Mr. Charles D. Smith, who has been in the employ of the Garrett County Bank for some months, will resign his position about June 1st and locate in the State of West Virginia for the practice of law. The position thus made vacant has been offered Mr. James C. Peddicord, of Oakland.

The time locks and interior workings of the Corliss safe in the Garrett County Bank underwent an overhauling at the hands of an expert from the factory yesterday. This is done at stated intervals with all safes of this character to more fully insure the accurate working of the delicate mechanism contained in them.

Advertisements calling for recruits for the regular army are posted in the postoffice but so far none have gone from here to enlist. They will hardly go at all as any young man in as fine condition as the recruits are required to be can make so much or more by remaining at home than he can in the army.

The discovery of what was at first pronounced itch among the pupils of the Terra Alta school, followed later by the discovery of genuine hard shelled "gray backs," leads one to remark that a building once occupied by a camp of sun-tanned sons of Italy is never of much account any more and ought to be burned to the ground.—Kingwood Argus.

Regulations for Lent were read out in the Catholic churches Sunday. They do not differ materially from those in past years. For some time, by an indult, working people among Catholics have been permitted to eat meat once a day on all fast days in the week with certain exceptions instead of, as formerly, abstaining from it altogether. The exceptions are Good Friday, Ash Wednesday, the Wednesday and Saturday of Holy Writ. Persons in delicate health are not required to fast or even to strictly abstain, if their physical condition will not permit, but in lieu thereof all are expected to mortify the flesh in some other way. In the circulars read out Sunday special stress was laid upon the use of intoxicating liquors during Lent and those addicted to them were counseled to deny themselves at least during the penitential period.

Lenten Services.

In St. Matthew's church, Oakland, Lenten services will be held every Monday, Wednesday and Friday at 4.15 p. m. by the rector, Rev. W. H. Osmond.

New Safe Received.

The new seven-ton Corliss safe for the First National Bank was delivered here Monday afternoon by the railroad company and on Tuesday morning it was unloaded and hauled to the bank building. The safe was taken from the car on a skidway and then set upon an improvised sled made of heavy oak planks upon which it was drawn through the streets by six horses. The manufacturers of the safe had a representative here to superintend the work which was accomplished in a comparatively short time. Since its installation in the bank building it has been examined and greatly admired by many people.

Found Dead in Bed.

Mr. August Smith, an old resident of this county, living near Thayerville, died Tuesday night. His wife arose early Tuesday morning, and after attending to some household duties returned to the bedroom to awaken her husband, and calling him several times and receiving no reply she investigated the cause and to her astonishment found life to be extinct. Mr. Smith was the father-in-law of Mr. William Kahl, of near town.

Death of Mrs. John Cornelius.

Died, at the Glades Hotel, in Oakland on Saturday last after an illness of several weeks, of Bright's disease with grip complications, Rebecca, beloved wife of John Cornelius and daughter of Giles and Sarah Easton, of Ohio. The deceased was born at Upton, Franklin county, Pa., January 1st, 1846, and was therefore aged a little more than 55 years.

On September 14, 1864, she became the wife of Mr. Cornelius, the marriage taking place near Perryburg, Ohio. From this union seven children were born—all daughters—all of whom survive the mother. They are Mrs. F. G. Hyde, Mrs. J. L. White, Mrs. James D. Hamill, Mrs. W. A. Boddy and Miss Kate Cornelius, of Oakland; Mrs. H. B. Ramsdell, of Rochester, N. Y., and Mrs. H. A. Paddock, of New York City. Mrs. Cornelius is also survived by her husband, her aged father and mother, two sisters, one brother and three grndchildren.

The deceased lady was a consistent member the Protestant Episcopal church, her remains being interred in the churchyard of St. Matthew's Tuesday afternoon after services having been conducted in the parlors of the hotel by the rector, Rev. W. H. Osmond. The pallbearers were Messrs. D. E. Offutt, S. T. Jones, G. S. Hamill, A. G. Sturgiss, J. M. Davis and E. H. Bartlett. The floral tributes sent by friends and relatives were exceedingly handsome and in profusion. These were borne to the grave by Messrs. W. R. Offutt, R. F. Bartlett and Bowie Johnson. One of the designs, a large cross of roses, carnations and lillies of the valley, came from Mr. Cornelius, a fitting tribute to the memory of his departed helpmeet.

Mrs. Cornelius' home life was one of unalloyed love toward her husband and children. She was in every sense a home woman, putting it far above everything else.

Church Matters.

At the congregational meeting of the membership of St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church held on Sunday morning after the preaching services, it was decided to sell the present parsonage and with the money received from that source to erect a new parsonage on the strip of ground south of the church and adjoining the property of G. H. Pritchard. The plans for the new building have already been drawn and accepted by the official board of the church. The parsonage will contain nine rooms and hallway. From the front hall direct communication with the church proper will be had through a door in the rear of the pulpit. Alterations in the interior of the church will also be made.

Value of the Local Newspaper.

A local newspaper reflects the business interests of the town in its advertising columns. A business man looking for a location always examines newspapers to see how his particular line is represented. If he is a druggist he concludes there are no druggists, or if there are, they are all dead. If he is a doctor or a lawyer, he looks over the professional cards to see if his profession is represented. Among the farmer subscribers the home paper has a similar mission. The prospective buyers like an invitation to come and trade with the merchants. A card of a professional man is just as essential as the sign in front of his door. It is not a question of being able to get along without it. A hardware man need not heat his stove to keep things from freezing. He might have a booth out on the street or a skating rink, and do a lot of business, instead of paying rent for a store and buying fuel to heat it with, but it might not be economy to do so. Advertising is not a luxury, but rather an economic proposition recognized by all the best and most successful business men the world over.

Hoyes.

The people generally have been making good use of the fine sledding and sleighing which we have had for the past few weeks and good prospects for plenty of more snow, according to the old adage, "If ground hog day is fair and clear we will have two winters this year."

Very few persons in our neighborhood have escaped whooping cough or grip this winter, but at this time we are glad to say all are getting better.

Mrs. Miller, wife of the late Timothy Miller, died at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Nelson McGettigan, on last Saturday evening. Interment at Flatwoods cemetery on Monday at 10.30 a. m.

Our school is still progressing very nicely with Prof. A. W. DeWitt as teacher.

The second quarterly meeting of the conference year was held at this place Saturday and Sunday last and was well attended. On Sunday Presiding Elder L. W. Roberts was present and preached several excellent sermons.

We are sorry to note the serious illness of Mrs. Thomas Bishoff at this writing. We hope for her recovery soon.

Mr. Daniel DeWitt's house, with nearly all its contents, was destroyed by fire on Tuesday of this week. The fire started from a stovepipe while the family was at dinner and they did not discover it until the whole roof was ablaze and were unable to save but a few pieces.

Mr. Adolphus Enlow, our horse jockey, says he is doing a booming business trading horses.

Mr. Abel DeWitt and family, of near Deer Park, was visiting Meshack Mattingly and W. A. Smith Sunday.

Prof. V. D. Miller is giving music lessons to several of our young people.

Mr. Joe Keller purchased a fine cutter a few days ago. Now, girls, you can look out, for some one will get a sleigh ride.

Mr. Wm. Sebold and family came down from Loch Lynn to attend the funeral of Mrs. Miller on Monday.

La Grippe Quickly Cured.

"In the winter of 1898 and 1899 I was taken down with a severe attack of what is called La Grippe," says F. L. Hewett, a prominent druggist of Winfield, Ill. "The only medicine I used was two bottles of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. It broke up the cold and stopped the coughing like magic, and I have never since been troubled with Grippe." Chamberlain's Cough Remedy can always be depended upon to break up a severe cold and ward off any threatened attack of pneumonia. It is pleasant to take, too, which makes it the most desirable and one of the most popular preparations in use for these ailments. For sale by all druggists.

OUR FIRST VALENTINE

On our childhood's happy day,
Long ago,
When we loved to romp and play
In the snow,
When our laughter was so glad,
When at school we learned to add
We our first wee sweetheart had,
As you know.

O, she was an angel fair
From the skies,
With glory in her hair
And her eyes;
How our little hearts would beat
When she smiled on us so sweet,
How our blushes when we'd meet
Would arise.

To that gentle maid divine
We one day
Sent a tiny valentine
Made to say:
"Roses red and violets blue,
Sugar is sweet and so are you,
If your love like mine is true
No knife can cut our love in two,
I am thine."

Since those happy days of curls,
Long ago,
We have loved some other girls,
As you know.
But those other girls combined
Never charmed our heart and mind
As that first wee sweetheart shrined—
That is so.

To those other girls we've sent Valentines
Costing dollars gladly spent,
And the lines,
Written by some poet great,
All were strictly up to date,
And artistic and ornate
In designs.

But those costly gems of art,
Decked with gold,
Never thrilled a tender heart
Like the old
Little penny thing we laid
At our sweetheart's door afraid
Lest the secret thus conveyed
Should be told.

A PREMATURE VALENTINE.

LARISSA ROBERTS and her mother lived in a little brown house that looked like a groundbird's nest so small and cozy was it. They had agreed that it was just the right size, which was a sensible way of looking at the matter as they could not afford a larger one. When Clarissa's father died the little money that was left after his affairs were settled had been invested in this place. Their many friends were horror struck, at first, to think that they would be willing to adopt such a simple style of living after the luxurious one to which they had been accustomed; but Clarissa and Mrs. Roberts decided that it would not be honest to assume to be what they were not, so the debts were paid instead.

But they succeeded in making the little cottage such a home-like place that even the old friends looked with envious eyes at the pretty dove-cote, and more than one said: "It is an ideal home, and not so bad, after all." The veranda was a bower of beauty in the summer time, for it was covered with woodbine and Virginia creeper; and in the winter the "Ampelopsis-vitchi," so common in the south, kept rich and green—with the exception of faint tints of crimson that came with the frosts. The windows were bright and cheery with gardens of geraniums, heliotrope and marguerites and from the street presented a pretty appearance. There was nothing elaborate in the interior; most of the heavy furniture had been sold, for both Mrs. Roberts and Clarissa had a sense of the eternal fitness of things, and knew it would be out of place here.

To be sure, the parlor was also the sitting-room and library, but Clarissa's deft fingers had transformed it into a veritable shrine. The pretty ingrain carpet made one think of a bed of moss, and the white net curtains were shirred on small brass rods, draped back artistically at the sides, and tied with long loops of white ribbon. A handsome yellow jardiniere with a tall palm stood in one window and a hanging basket in the other window completed the picture. There were pictures and books galore, and in one corner a guitar spoke eloquently of the taste of the owners.

When it had been announced that Clarissa was going to teach in the high school, the numerous friends were indignant. "Of all persons Clarissa Roberts was the last one of whom I would have thought it," was the protest. But Clarissa remained serene and went along the even tenor of her way, paying no attention to Madam Grundy.

The eighth grade was noted for its refractory pupils, but when the new teacher came to rule there was a decided change. Everything went off beautifully the first day or two, and many comments were passed on her amiability. One of the girls said to Tim Sage: "My, isn't she pretty?" whereupon he assented with a nod and said, as he looked at her black eyes and red hair: "I bet she gets mad awful easy, and won't it be a picnic?" Tim smacked his lips as if he anticipated a feast.

But they soon learned that Miss Roberts ruled by love instead of fear and therefore the majority disliked to displease her, though sometimes they carried their mischievousness too far. But it was evident that Miss Roberts' methods were not to be tampered with, for woe was it to the youngster who disobeyed the rules. She was patient, no one could deny that, but even "patience ceases to be a virtue," sometimes, and so it was with her.

Tim Sage, the youth of whom mention has been made, had a superabundance of spirits, and one day they overflowed. Clarissa reprimanded him quietly several times, and finally when he created a sensation by producing angleworms from the depths of a mysterious pocket, with which he frightened the girls, she took the youngster in hand.

"Tim," said she, sternly, "you may remain after school."

It was then that a settlement took place, and being of a sullen disposition he never forgot the punishment, which, after his reign of terror and of being allowed to do as he pleased, was rather humiliating. He said nothing, however, and Clarissa congratulated herself on the success of her discipline, for the boy continued to behave unusually well.

CLARISSA OPENED ONE AFTER ANOTHER.

Alas! "Still waters often run deep"—and this was the case with Tim.

On the evening of Valentine day Prof. Spencer, the superintendent of the school, walked home with Clarissa and talked over some exercises they were planning for the 22d. As they parted at the gate the young man asked if he might call that evening and perfect the arrangement. Clarissa assented, and tipping his hat graciously and thanking her, he left her. On entering the house, Clarissa gave her mother a hug and said: "Mamma, dear, Prof. Spencer is going to spend the evening with us, so we will have to give up our plan, and some other time will do just as well."

"By the way, daughter, here is the mail and one in a strange handwriting."

Clarissa opened one after another and smiled at the effusion of some of the valentines, for she knew they came from a number of her girl pupils who were devotion itself.

She came to the last one that was addressed in a masculine hand which she could not mistake, and a faint hue of pink came into her cheeks. She hastily tore the envelope open and read:

"Salem, Va., Feb. 14, 1896.

"Dear Miss Roberts: It must be that you have discovered the love I bear you, and which it has been impossible for me to hide. I have watched you from day to day, hoping that I would see some response to my affection, and am not disappointed, for I believe it is returned. Believe me that this is not my fault alone, for your conduct has led me to feel that my love is reciprocated, and therefore I ask you to be my valentine, and make me happy.

"Your sincere admirer and Valentine."

Clarissa's fingers trembled, and her eyes flashed threateningly, but without a word she handed the letter to her mother, who read it slowly and then reread it before speaking.

There was no denying the fact that Clarissa admired Prof. Spencer more than any other man, but she knew that she had concealed her regard with the utmost care, for he had never made any loverly advances.

She was disappointed and chagrined. He had always been so courteous and agreeable, so perfectly dignified, and now he was so bold and presumptuous—so rude as to assert that he was sure of her affection, that she had shown it clearly. She laid her head in her mother's lap and had a good cry, girl-like. But Mrs. Roberts soothed and quieted her by by saying there must be some mistake.

"But you see there can't be, mamma; you see it is in his own handwriting and I know it so well."

Then going to her writing desk she took out a slip of paper on which a report was written, and signed Prof. J. W. Spencer. The writing corresponded, there was no denying the fact, and the two women were silent until a knock at the door startled them and Clarissa darted into another room.

"A box of flowers, dear," said her mother; "shall I open it?"

An exquisite bunch of violets nestling among the green leaves, delighted the beauty-loving eyes of the girl and the delicate odor soothed her tired nerves. She had not noticed the card, but there it lay and she read: "James W. Spencer—with best wishes."

The innocent flowers smiled, but Clarissa did not notice; their beauty was spoiled now.

Replacing the cover, she wrote a hurried note of thanks and curtly asked Mr. Spencer to pardon her, but said she could not accept them after his presumptuous conduct. Then calling to Tim, who happened to be passing, she asked him to deliver the package for her.

Tim chuckled inwardly, but was very polite and accommodating, and an hour from the time the box was first sent, it was back to the donor.

To say that Prof. Spencer was amazed does not express the feelings he experienced on opening the box. "It is so unlike her," he thought; "what can she mean?" He knew there was a misunderstanding somewhere, his mathematical judgment taught him that and with a determined air he made his toilet.

He was always particular about his attire, which was faultless on all occasions, and this evening spent more time than usual dressing. He had admired Clarissa for many years, and after her father's death his respect grew into something more substantial, but he watched her career with no little interest and when she went to teaching as a means of livelihood, he knew that her character was not weak or flimsy.

While walking towards the Roberts cottage his heart warmed toward Clarissa, and in spite of her rebuff he made several resolutions.

As he neared the house he saw a pretty little domestic picture, for Clarissa with a colony of kittens in her lap and their mother at her feet, was enjoying it, unconscious of an audience.

Mr. Spencer felt guilty, but he could not help gazing at the tableau before knocking. Mrs. Roberts admitted him, a trifle coolly, he thought, and Clarissa's manner was even more frigid than her note had been.

He forgot all about the "exercises," but immediately launched into the subject so near his heart.

"Miss Roberts, you will pardon me, but I could not understand your note, and I am sure there is some mistake."

The tones were calm and courteous, so Clarissa controlled her emotion and said: "After your letter, Mr. Spencer, I think it is not necessary for me to explain."

"My letter!" said he in amazement.

"Yes, your letter," responded Clarissa coolly, "in your handwriting and signed Valentine."

"Miss Roberts, allow me to say that I have not written you a word excepting the message I inclosed with the flowers."

"But I received a letter," stammered Clarissa, "and it certainly looks like your writing."

"May I see it, please?" asked Mr. Spencer.

Clarissa produced it somewhat reluctantly, and the former assured her that he was the victim of a practical joke.

The poor girl covered her face and cried: "Who could be so cruel?" Then it was Mr. Spencer's turn to play comforter.

"Do you feel so very badly, Miss Roberts?" said he. "Part of the note at least is true, in regard to my feeling toward you; but it seems some one has got ahead of me, and paved the way roughly."

It is needless to go into details. The tangle adjusted itself easily and Mr. Spencer and Clarissa arranged matters very satisfactorily; so much so that when another Valentine day came they were married, thanks to Tim's inimitable copying. As no one ever scolded the incorrigible boy, he thought the joke was too tame and therefore was disgusted with himself. It is needless to say that Prof. Spencer and Clarissa never took the trouble to correct him.—Louise E. Dew, in Ohio Farmer.

A CONFESSION.

"How did you come to pluck up enough courage to propose to Miss Frisbie, Bunting?"

A MODERN PENELOPE.

Princes from All Europe Sought Wilhelmina's Hand.

The Young Queen Is Not Beautiful, But Very Good to Look Upon—At Home in Kitchen as Well as Salon.

The young royal bride-to-be, Queen Wilhelmina Pauline Helen Marie of Holland, has had almost as many suitors as Penelope herself. For every royal house in Europe, except Roman Catholic families, that has a marriageable prince to offer has had designs upon Wilhelmina's heart and hand.

It is, by the way, to "King" Wilhelmina, not "Queen," that officials and other public servants take the oath of alligiance. This was decided upon some time ago by the Dutch high court of justice, and was in a line with Queen Emma's wishes. "I desire to make Queen Wilhelmina something more than a strong woman; I wish to make her a king."

The nuptial ceremonies will last a week and will take place at Amsterdam, instead of The Hague, the palace of the former being more commodious. The throneroom is one of the magnificent apartments of the world, with its superb marble columns and crystal chandeliers, of nearly 400 lights. The throne itself is covered with ruby velvet and edged with ruby and gold fringe; the back is surmounted by a crown containing sapphires, with lions in support; another crown and the letter "W" is wrought on the velvet just beneath. The front of the chair is a footstool to match the canopy. The canopy is curtained in ruby velvet, with gold cord; it is surmounted by a crown and ostrich plumes; on the inner center are embroidered the royal arms and motto: "Je maintiendrai."

The style of the ballroom is empire, with a small French piano at one end, while crimson and gold are the colors.

The order for her wedding gown the queen has given to the ladies of the school of art needlework in Amsterdam, who so successfully embroidered her coronation robes. One of her ball gowns will be of white satin, embroidered all over with forget-me-nots in silver and pale blue.

QUEEN WILHELMINA.
(Princes from Every Land Sought Her Hand in Marriage.)

The women of several different provinces will present their queen with national costumes. That of Friesland, the the gift of 8,000 women, is described as quaint, if not strictly graceful, with its amplitude of drapery and silver hair ornaments. The gold and silver ornaments for the queen's headdress are preserved among the crown jewels as the property of the nation.

No ruler in the world attends more strictly to her duties than Queen Wilhelmina. She is busy every day with the matters which her ministers lay before her and with the affairs of her court. She has said of herself that she never plays, but always works. Those concerns which we might rashly consider to be her pleasures—her receptions and state banquets—are, in fact, her most irksome duties. During the "season" she is bound to notice, with exactly equal attention, each one of the 400 or 500 persons of the court. Note is kept of these courtesies and of the order in which she pays them, and she has punctiliously to acquit herself of the whole duty down to the properly timed and measured chat with the last diplomat and his wife before the close of the last levee.

The young queen is not beautiful, but very good to look upon—wholesome and frank, with a pleasant smile for everyone. She has blue eyes, a clear complexion, a Grecian nose; her forehead is broad and rather high and her teeth are large, white and even; her blond hair, which is slightly wavy, is brushed back to show the "orange ear." She has a well-shaped head and a slender, graceful figure, with a queenly bearing.

Her education having been conducted in the most conservative Dutch fashion, it follows that she is thoroughly versed in domestic science, knowing how to cook and sew; she embroiders beautifully.

To Stop Duelling in Cuba.

Gov. Gen. Wood has decided to issue a decree whereby not only the principals in duels are liable to be punished, as provided by the present law, but also the seconds and the persons who carry the challenges. Gov. Wood has received many requests from the mothers and wives of Cubans asking him to put down duelling, which is being used as a means of blackmailing or extorting money by certain expert swordsmen of Havana. It is expected that by making an example of one or two of these bullies or their assistants by putting them t work breaking stones this evil will b remedied.

CAUGHT BY THE GRIP.

Released by Pe-ru-na---Congressman Howard's Recovery---Congressman Geo. H. White's Case.

La Grippe is epidemic catarrh.—It spares no class or nationality. The cultured and the ignorant, the aristocrat and the pauper. The masses and the classes are alike subject to la grippe. None are exempt—all are liable.

Have you the grip? Or, rather, has the grip got you? Grip is well named. The original French term, la grippe, has been shortened by the busy American to read "grip." Without intending to do so a new word has been coined that exactly describes the case. As if some hideous giant with awful Grip had clutched us in its fatal clasp. Men, women, children, whole towns and cities are caught in the baneful grip of a terrible monster.

Pe-ru-na for Grip.

Mrs. Dr. C. D. Powell, President of Epworth League, also President of Loyal Temperance Legion, writes from Chehalis, Wash.:

"I have used several remedies in cases of severe colds and la grippe, but none I consider of more value than Peruna."—Mrs. Dr. C. D. Powell.

The Peruna Medicine Co., Columbus.

After-Effects of La Grippe.

Miss Emma Jouris, President Golden Rod Sewing Circle, writes from 40 Burling street, Chicago, Ill., as follows:

"This spring I suffered severely from the after-effects of la grippe. As the doctors did not help me I bought a bottle of Peruna."—Miss Emma Jouris.

Congressman Howard's Letter.

Fort Payne, Ala.

The Peruna Medicine Co., Columbus, Ohio:

Gentlemen—"I have taken Peruna now for two weeks and find I am very much relieved. I feel that my cure will be permanent. I have also taken it for la grippe and I take pleasure in recommending Peruna as an excellent remedy to all fellow sufferers."—M. W. Howard, Member of Congress.

La Grippe Leaves the System in a Deplorable Condition.

D. L. Wallace, a charter member of the International Barbers' Union, writes from 15 Western Avenue, Minneapolis, Minn.:

"Following a severe attack of la grippe I seemed to be affected badly all over.

"One of my customers who was greatly helped by Peruna advised me to try it, and I procured a bottle the same day. Now my head is clear, my nerves are steady, I enjoy food, and rest well. Peruna has been worth a dollar a dose to me."—L. D. Wallace.

Grip Causes Deafness.

Mrs. M. A. Sharick, chaplain G. A. R. Woman's Relief Corps, writes from Fremont, Wash.:

"When la grippe was the prevailing illness in this Western country I was laid up the whole winter, I partially lost my hearing, and had a very bad case of catarrh of the head and throat.

"I read of Peruna, tried it and had my hearing restored and catarrh cured. I cannot speak too well of Peruna."—Mrs. M. A. Sharick.

La Grippe Cured in Its First Stage.

Lieutenant Clarice Hunt, of the Salt Lake City Barracks of the Salvation Army, writes from Ogden, Utah:

"Two months ago I was suffering with so severe cold that I could hardly speak.

"Our captain advised me to try Peruna, and procured a bottle for me, and truly it worked wonders. Within two weeks I was entirely well."—Clarice Hunt.

Congressman White's Letter.

Tarboro, N. C.

Gentlemen—"I am more than satisfied with Peruna and find it to be an excellent remedy for the grip and catarrh. I have used it in my family and they all join me in recommending it as an excellent remedy." Geo. H. White, Member of Congress.

Remained in Feeble Health After Cured of La Grippe.

Mrs. T. W. Collins, Treasurer Independent Order of Good Templars, of Everett, Wash., writes:

"After having a severe attack of la grippe I continued in a feeble condition even after the doctor called me cured. My blood seemed poisoned. Peruna cured me."—Mrs. T. W. Collins.

ART IN THE HOUSEHOLD.

How to Make the Dining Room Bright and Cheerful and Restful to the Eye.

All authorities agree that surroundings have much to do with digestion, and, as much of human happiness depends upon digestion, it is certainly our duty to bend our efforts toward making the dining-room as bright and pleasant as possible.

An east exposure is a very good one, as one gets the pretty morning sun and none of the hot afternoon sunshine. We cannot always decide these things for ourselves, but we can usually do much in overcoming disadvantages by care in furnishing. If the dining-room is a dark room which the sun's rays cannot enter, it is not a difficult matter to make sunshine from the inside. We know that the shades of yellow bring suggestions of sunshine to our minds, so here we have our first idea. Let the walls be yellow, using several shades, but being careful to keep clear of the lemon or pumpkin shades. Have the woodwork a soft creamy white enamel. A green carpet looks well in a room like this, but great care must be exercised in combining these two colors. There are beautiful carpets and rugs in the rich shades of yellow running into the nut brown which have a dash of red in them. Such a carpet would be particularly effective in a yellow dining-room. Some of the ingrains have beautiful brown effects, which would be most pleasing as well as inexpensive.

The Flemish oak finish, mahogany or dark shades of oak are the best woods for furniture. If you are furnishing anew, do not select one of the heavy sideboards, unless you can afford a very handsome one. There are so many less clumsy little buffets and tables which make a far better appearance for less money. For pictures, avoid the print pictures which one sees in so many dining-rooms. Depend more upon fancy plates and odd dishes for wall decorations than upon pictures. The pictures you have should be those that rest the eye and bring a quieting influence. The beer steins or mugs make very effective decorations for dining-rooms. They can be bought for a very moderate sum, for really good designs.

If you can manage it, always have a blossoming plant or a green fern for the table, as they add so much. There are a number of inexpensive little mossy-like ferns which will flourish under most unpromising conditions. Have your curtains clean, and even though they be of the most inexpensive of muslins they will add much to the room. The coarsest and commonest table linen can be kept clean and white, and care should always be taken to have everything put on the table carefully and not thrown down any way. Just now there is a preference for all white centerpieces, but this is a matter best decided by personal taste.—Radford Review.

Old-Time Cabbage Salad.

A good old-fashioned cabbage salad is made of one head each of cabbage and celery. Chop fine, mix well together and sprinkle with a tablespoonful of salt. Into a double boiler put two tablespoonfuls of butter, and one teaspoonful of flour. Blend, then add a generous half cupful of cider vinegar, a tablespoonful of sugar, a teaspoonful of mustard, the beaten yolks of two eggs and lastly three tablespoonfuls of cream. Cook, stirring constantly until thick and smooth. Add a dash of cayenne, pour over the cabbage and stand away to get cool. Just before serving add a little whipped cream.

Vegetables with Roast Goose.

The vegetables to be served with roast goose are boiled or mashed potatoes, mashed yellow turnips or winter squash, apples stewed without sugar, or cranberry jam, boiled onions, pickles and dressed celery should be served fowl.

DAINTY LITTLE GIFTS.

How to Make a Number of Pretty and Useful Trifles at Merely Nominal Expense.

New ways of using crape paper for decorative purposes are always suggesting themselves to the imaginative mind. One of the latest is a twine-holder made from a little doll dressed in the figured paper. It makes a very pretty and useful gift, and is at the same time inexpensive. A 25-cent doll, half a roll of crape paper, a ball of twine and a couple of yards of ribbon are the only requirements.

Remove the legs from the doll and sew firmly to the end of the body a little silk bag just large enough to hold the twine ball loosely. Then dress the doll in a big, full skirt and two full capes. Fasten the capes at the neck with a long bow of ribbon. A jaunty little hat, made of tufted crape paper and trimmed with ribbon bows, adds to the finishing touch. Sew the hat to the head and leave one long loop of ribbon by which to hang to the wall. Dolls dressed in the crimson crape paper are very pretty, and look well with black ribbons. Larger dolls made with two twine bags, to hold string of two sizes, are very useful. These always sell well at church fairs.

A pretty ribbon blotter for a ladies' writing table can be made by covering a piece of stiff cardboard the size that the blotter is intended to be with silk or some prettily colored linen. Then cut six sheets of blotting paper a fraction smaller than the pad and fasten them to it with broad bands of satin ribbon, embroidered in some dainty pattern. The ribbon should be firmly sewed down so that it will hold the blotters, but must not be drawn so tightly that soiled blotters cannot be removed and new replaced. A big bow of ribbon of any color may be tied on one side, which adds to the richness of this gift.

Frames are always welcome gifts, and they can be made in so many forms that they are almost sure to suit all tastes. A new and very pretty one is made of Japanese crash, and decorated with a design cut from a wall paper and applied. In all cases it is bettter when making a home-made frame to have the form cut by a regular frame-maker. It only costs a few cents and is so much more satisfactory, as it is almost impossible to get the edges regular without the proper machines, and nothing could look worse than an uneven frame. Japanese crash costs about a dollar a yard, and one yard will cover a dozen frames of cabinet size. The large designs in the wall paper with a decided coloring are the most effective for applying. If the flowers and leaves are carefully cut out they can be so arranged as to form a very pretty spray, and, if well done, they will look just like a water color. Sometimes a wall paper is found rich enough to make the entire covering for a frame. These are usually improved by having the back washed in with a little water color. Blotters and scrap baskets made in the same way are equally effective. The frames, if intended for steady use, should all be bound and glassed. They will last indefinitely, and cannot be injured by dust.—Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

A FEMININE WEAKNESS.

The Claims of Scores of American Women to Aristocracy Are Childish and Ridiculous.

Perhaps the fetish to which we women attach the most undue importance is social position, writes "An American Mother," in the Ladies' Home Journal. "We set out with the creed that we are all equal, and then spend much of our lives in struggling to force our way into some petty circle which is barred against us, or to bar our own against some of our neighbors. Nothing could be more ridiculous than the many foundations on which we Americans base our claims to aristocracy. The belief is almost universal that the possession of a certain enormous number of millions constitutes a caste which stands on the level of royalty. But short of these stupendous heaps of gold, money does not always command precedence here, especially in our small towns and villages. We are all of us ready with our gibe at the new rich as if our own blood had been pure as that of Daimio for a thousand years. Our claims to high caste are often based upon some mythical judge or baronet far in the dim past; or that we live in the most pretentious house in the village. I have known the possesion of a Grecian portico to give social ascendancy to one family over a town full of neighbors, plebeian only in that they had no porches at all. So vague yet so strenuous are our ideas of caste."

To Make Gravy Palatable.

If the gravy is very fat take some of it off; put the pan over the fire, let it become hot, then stir it into a thin batter. An old fowl is fit for nothing but soup.

EVOLUTION OF BREEDS.

Studying the Pedigree of Our So-Called Native Cows Brings Out Some Odd Facts.

Tracing the evolution of breeds is always interesting. Someone has been figuring out the pedigree of the so-called "native" cow of this country and brings to light some odd facts that are worth recording. As early as 1611 dairy cows were brought to Virginia from England, and 13 years later there was an importation into the Plymouth colony. This was in 1624. These cows were brought from Devonshire, England, and were doubtless of the same stock as that from which the Devon breed was developed at a later period. This probably accounts for the predominance of red color in the native New England cattle. Whether or not the Virginia cows were from the same locality we do not know for a certainty. At a little later period evidently cattle were imported into Virginia from Spain. These cattle were black. The Dutch, having settled New York, naturally brought cows from their own country. Some of these are known to have come from off the coast of Holland. That was before the development of fixed breeds even in Holland, but we may fairly infer that they were related to the progenitors of the Dutch belted cattle. Delaware was provided with cattle from Sweden, and it is said that from Denmark were brought the cattle that became famous in New Hampshire. Coming down to revolutionary times we find that cattle had, at that date, been previously imported from Great Britain and Ireland in considerable numbers. Some of these, we know from tradition, were white Durhams, especially white Durham bulls. The general mix-up of all of these breeds, which subsequently took place, gave us the almost endless variety of form and color now seen in American cattle.

RECORD-BREAKING BULL.
(Dale, Sold at Chicago Stock Yards, for $7,500.)

FEEDING DAIRY COWS.

The System in Vogue at the Minnesota Experiment Station Is Said to Be Perfect.

The herd of milch cows at the Minnesota Experiment station is one of the most profitable in the country. In a report one of the professors tells how they are fed:

Few people have any idea how carefully we watch the physical tone and feeding capacity of every animal in the dairy department of the university herd. A stranger passing along in front of the cows when they are finishing their evening meal, and seeing how clean they lick out the manger, not leaving as much as could be put on the end of a penknife, would conclude that the cows were not being liberally fed; in fact, that they were half starved. And as conclusive evidence that such were really the case, he would point at the clearly defined ribs, sharp hips and backbone, thin thighs and necks, and probably remark that he would not have such a scrawny animal in his barn. And yet, if an additional pound of grain were added to their ration probably half the cows would go off their feed before the close of the week.

Our barn is open to the public, and scarcely a day passes when there is not a visitor there inspecting it. We feed twice a day and challenge anyone to find in the mangers of the 40 cows a cupful of food, grain or roughage, after they have finished their meal. Once in awhile, one not feeling just right will leave a little, but this is removed at once, and generally by the next feeding time she will need the usual amount. No food should be left in the mangers from one feeding period to another. Cows should be kept away from food between meals.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases of of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

A Biblical Joke.

"When a man has a family of growing children he learns lots of things that, while they may be old, are new to him," said a prominent member of the Produce exchange. "One of my youngsters sprang a riddle on me which runs this way: 'Who was a well-known Biblical character never named in the Bible, whose death was the most peculiar in history, whose shroud is a part of every household, and the cause of whose death was the subject of a widely-read novel?' I'll wager none of you fellows can give me the answer." Not being students of Biblical lore, they all gave it up. "Lot's wife is the character," went on the proud parent. "That's the only name by which she is known in the Bible. She was turned into a pillar of salt, consequently her shroud is in every household. Her death resulted from looking backward, the title of Bellamy's famous book. Rather ingenious, don't you think?"—Philadelphia Record.

YOU'RE WEAK Instead of Strong!

Make Yourself a New Man!

DR. GREENE'S NERVURA

BLOOD AND NERVE REMEDY.

Will Give You the Strength and Vigor of Perfect Manhood. Renews, Vitalizes and Invigorates Weak Men.

Old before his time! A broken-down, miserable wreck—weak, nervous, discouraged!

The world to him seems a place of mist, peopled with ghostly beings, whose flitting to and fro about their daily tasks serves but to irritate him. He sneers at healthy amusements, and finds no comfort or pleasure in life.

He is sick and he does not know it. He drags about, and therefore thinks he is well. He is despondent and peevish, and weak, and he does not know that there are merely signals—some from the stomach crying for aid—others from the nerves beseeching strength—still others from the great life-current—the blood—moaning that it is so impeded and clogged with impurities that it cannot move.

He, and all others like him, will find immediate relief in Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy. This is just what it was intended for. It never fails to make weak men strong and vigorous, puts new life, vim, strength, power and energy into them.

Dr. Greene's Nervura is New Life, Hope and Strength for Weak Men.

Mr. JOHN D. SMITH, electrician for the Thompson-Houston Electric Co., of Lynn, Mass., says:—"When a man has been sick and is cured, it is his duty to tell others about it, that they, too, may get well. Three years ago I had been working almost night and day, could not (at regularly) and got only a few hour sleep at night. No man can stand that long, and I soon began to be prostrated. I could not sleep when I tried, and my food would not stay on my stomach. I was in a terrible condition, and was much alarmed. I went to doctors, but they did me no good. Learning of the wonderful good done by Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy, I determined to try it. It cured me completely of all my complaints. I eat heartily and sleep well, thanks to this splendid medicine. I believe it to be the best remedy in existence."

Dr. Greene's Nervura is the One Great Restorative Which Cures.

ART IN THE HOUSEHOLD.

How to Make the Dining Room Bright and Cheerful and Restful to the Eye.

All authorities agree that surroundings have much to do with digestion, and, as much of human happiness depends upon digestion, it is certainly our duty to bend our efforts toward making the dining-room as bright and pleasant as possible.

An east exposure is a very good one, as one gets the pretty morning sun and none of the hot afternoon sunshine. We cannot always decide these things for ourselves, but we can usually do much in overcoming disadvantages by care in furnishing. If the dining-room is a dark room which the sun's rays cannot enter, it is not a difficult matter to make sunshine from the inside. We know that the shades of yellow bring suggestions of sunshine to our minds, so here we have our first idea. Let the walls be yellow, using several shades, but being careful to keep clear of the lemon or pumpkin shades. Have the woodwork a soft creamy white enamel. A green carpet looks well in a room like this, but great care must be exercised in combining these two colors. There are beautiful carpets and rugs in the rich shades of yellow running into the nut brown which have a dash of red in them. Such a carpet would be particularly effective in a yellow dining-room. Some of the ingrains have beautiful brown effects, which would be most pleasing as well as inexpensive.

The Flemish oak finish, mahogany or dark shades of oak are the best woods for furniture. If you are furnishing anew, do not select one of the heavy sideboards, unless you can afford a very handsome one. There are so many less clumsy little buffets and tables which make a far better appearance for less money. For pictures, avoid the print pictures which one sees in so many dining-rooms. Depend more upon fancy plates and odd dishes for wall decorations than upon pictures. The pictures you have should be those that rest the eye and bring a quieting influence. The beer steins or mugs make very effective decorations for dining-rooms. They can be bought for a very moderate sum, for really good designs.

If you can manage it, always have a blossoming plant or a green fern for the table, as they add so much. There are a number of inexpensive little mossy-like ferns which will flourish under most unpromising conditions. Have your curtains clean, and even though they be of the most inexpensive of muslins they will add much to the room. The coarsest and commonest table linen can be kept clean and white, and care should always be taken to have everything put on the table carefully and not thrown down any way. Just now there is a preference for all white centerpieces, but this is a matter best decided by personal taste.—Radford Review.

Old-Time Cabbage Salad.

A good old-fashioned cabbage salad is made of one head each of cabbage and celery. Chop fine, mix well together and sprinkle with a tablespoonful of salt. Into a double boiler put two tablespoonfuls of butter, and one teaspoonful of flour. Blend, then add a generous half cupful of cider vinegar, a tablespoonful of sugar, a teaspoonful of mustard, the beaten yolks of two eggs and lastly three tablespoonfuls of cream. Cook, stirring constantly until thick and smooth. Add a dash of cayenne, pour over the cabbage and stand away to get cool. Just before serving add a little whipped cream.

Vegetables with Roast Goose.

The vegetables to be served with roast goose are boiled or mashed potatoes, mashed yellow turnips or winter squash, apples stewed without sugar, or cranberry jam, boiled onions, pickles and dressed celery should be served fowl.

DAINTY LITTLE GIFTS.

How to Make a Number of Pretty and Useful Trifles at Merely Nominal Expense.

New ways of using crape paper for decorative purposes are always suggesting themselves to the imaginative mind. One of the latest is a twine-holder made from a little doll dressed in the figured paper. It makes a very pretty and useful gift, and is at the same time inexpensive. A 25-cent doll, half a roll of crape paper, a ball of twine and a couple of yards of ribbon are the only requirements.

Remove the legs from the doll and sew firmly to the end of the body a little silk bag just large enough to hold the twine ball loosely. Then dress the doll in a big, full skirt and two full capes. Fasten the capes at the neck with a long bow of ribbon. A jaunty little hat, made of tufted crape paper and trimmed with ribbon bows, adds to the finishing touch. Sew the hat to the head and leave one long loop of ribbon by which to hang to the wall. Dolls dressed in the crimson crape paper are very pretty, and look well with black ribbons. Larger dolls made with two twine bags, to hold string of two sizes, are very useful. These always sell well at church fairs.

A pretty ribbon blotter for a ladies' writing table can be made by covering a piece of stiff cardboard the size that the blotter is intended to be with silk or some prettily colored linen. Then cut six sheets of blotting paper a fraction smaller than the pad and fasten them to it with broad bands of satin ribbon, embroidered in some dainty pattern. The ribbon should be firmly sewed down so that it will hold the blotters, but must not be drawn so tightly that soiled blotters cannot be removed and new replaced. A big bow of ribbon of any color may be tied on one side, which adds to the richness of this gift.

Frames are always welcome gifts, and they can be made in so many forms that they are almost sure to suit all tastes. A new and very pretty one is made of Japanese crash, and decorated with a design cut from a wall paper and applied. In all cases it is bettter when making a home-made frame to have the form cut by a regular frame-maker. It only costs a few cents and is so much more satisfactory, as it is almost impossible to get the edges regular without the proper machines, and nothing could look worse than an uneven frame. Japanese crash costs about a dollar a yard, and one yard will cover a dozen frames of cabinet size. The large designs in the wall paper with a decided coloring are the most effective for applying. If the flowers and leaves are carefully cut out they can be so arranged as to form a very pretty spray, and, if well done, they will look just like a water color. Sometimes a wall paper is found rich enough to make the entire covering for a frame. These are usually improved by having the back washed in with a little water color. Blotters and scrap baskets made in the same way are equally effective. The frames, if intended for steady use, should all be bound and glassed. They will last indefinitely, and cannot be injured by dust.—Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

A FEMININE WEAKNESS.

The Claims of Scores of American Women to Aristocracy Are Childish and Ridiculous.

Perhaps the fetish to which we women attach the most undue importance is social position, writes "An American Mother," in the Ladies' Home Journal. "'We set out with the creed that we are all equal, and then spend much of our lives in struggling to force our way into some petty circle which is barred against us, or to bar our own against some of our neighbors. Nothing could be more ridiculous than the many foundations on which we Americans base our claims to aristocracy. The belief is almost universal that the possession of a certain enormous number of millions constitutes a caste which stands on the level of royalty. But short of these stupendous heaps of gold, money does not always command precedence here, especially in our small towns and villages. We are all of us ready with our gibe at the new rich as if our own blood had been pure as that of Daimio for a thousand years. Our claims to high caste are often based upon some mythical judge or baronet far in the dim past; or that we live in the most pretentious house in the village. I have known the possesion of a Grecian portico to give social ascendancy to one family over a town full of neighbors, plebeian only in that they had no porches at all. So vague yet so strenuous are our ideas of caste."

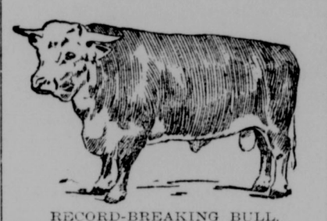
EVOLUTION OF BREEDS.

Studying the Pedigree of Our So-Called Native Cows Brings Out Some Odd Facts.

Tracing the evolution of breeds is always interesting. Someone has been figuring out the pedigree of the so-called "native" cow of this country and brings to light some odd facts that are worth recording. As early as 1611 dairy cows were brought to Virginia from England, and 13 years later there was an importation into the Plymouth colony. This was in 1624. These cows were brought from Devonshire, England, and were doubtless of the same stock as that from which the Devon breed was developed at a later period. This probably accounts for the predominance of red color in the native New England cattle. Whether or not the Virginia



RECORD-BREAKING BULL.
(Dale, Sold at Chicago Stock Yards, for $7,500.)

cows were from the same locality we do not know for a certainty. At a little later period evidently cattle were imported into Virginia from Spain. These cattle were black. The Dutch, having settled New York, naturally brought cows from their own country. Some of these are known to have come from off the coast of Holland. That was before the development of fixed breeds even in Holland, but we may fairly infer that they were related to the progenitors of the Dutch belted cattle. Delaware was provided with cattle from Sweden, and it is said that from Denmark were brought the cattle that became famous in New Hampshire. Coming down to revolutionary times we find that cattle had, at that date, been previously imported from Great Britain and Ireland in considerable numbers. Some of these, we know from tradition, were white Durhams, especially white Durham bulls. The general mix-up of all of these breeds, which subsequently took place, gave us the almost endless variety of form and color now seen in American cattle.

FEEDING DAIRY COWS.

The System in Vogue at the Minnesota Experiment Station Is Said to Be Perfect.

The herd of milch cows at the Minnesota Experiment station is one of the most profitable in the country. In a report one of the professors tells how they are fed:

Few people have any idea how carefully we watch the physical tone and feeding capacity of every animal in the dairy department of the university herd. A stranger passing along in front of the cows when they are finishing their evening meal, and seeing how clean they lick out the manger, not leaving as much as could be put on the end of a penknife, would conclude that the cows were not being liberally fed; in fact, that they were half starved. And as conclusive evidence that such were really the case, he would point at the clearly defined ribs, sharp hips and backbone, thin thighs and necks, and probably remark that he would not have such a scrawny animal in his barn. And yet, if an additional pound of grain were added to their ration probably half the cows would go off their feed before the close of the week.

Our barn is open to the public, and scarcely a day passes when there is not a visitor there inspecting it. We feed twice a day and challenge anyone to find in the mangers of the 40 cows a cupful of food, grain or roughage, after they have finished their meal. Once in awhile, one not feeling just right will leave a little, but this is removed at once, and generally by the next feeding time she will need the usual amount. No food should be left in the mangers from one feeding period to another. Cows should be kept away from food between meals.

Laying Cement Floors on Boards Is a Practice Coming Into General Use.

Sometimes conditions will not permit a cement floor to be laid directly upon the earth. Floor timbers and boards can be laid and a cement floor put directly upon that. The plan shown in the illustration will be found excellent. Lay the floor timbers and on these put boards, leaving a space of an inch between each. Deafness Cannot Be Cured by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases of of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

Mr. W. G. The above testimony is corroborated by many others who have suffered from virulent cutaneous disease which Palmer's Lotion never fails to cure, and all who have used it gladly recommend it to their friends and speak of it in terms of highest praise. A Biblical Joke.

"When a man has a family of growing children he learns lots of things that, while they may be old, are new to him," said a prominent member of the Produce exchange. "One of my youngsters sprang a riddle on me which runs this way: 'Who was a well-known Biblical character never named in the Bible, whose death was the most peculiar in history, whose shroud is a part of every household, and the cause of whose death was the subject of a widely-read novel?' I'll wager none of you fellows can give me the answer." Not being students of Biblical lore, they all gave it up. "Lot's wife is the character," went on the proud parent. "That's the only name by which she is known in the Bible. She was turned into a pillar of salt, consequently her shroud is in every household. Her death resulted from looking backward, the title of Bellamy's famous book. Rather ingenious, don't you think?"—Philadelphia Record.

Make Yourself a New Man!

DR. GREENE'S NERVURA

BLOOD AND NERVE REMEDY.

Will Give You the Strength and Vigor of Perfect Manhood. Renews, Vitalizes and Invigorates Weak Men.

Old before his time! A broken-down, miserable wreck—weak, nervous, discouraged!

The world to him seems a place of mist, peopled with ghostly beings, whose flitting to and fro about their daily tasks serves but to irritate him. He sneers at healthy amusements, and finds no comfort or pleasure in life.

He is sick and he does not know it. He drags about, and therefore thinks he is well. He is despondent and peevish, and weak, and he does not know that there are merely signals—some from the stomach crying for aid—others from the nerves beseeching strength—still others from the great life-current—the blood—moaning that it is so impeded and clogged with impurities that it cannot move.

He, and all others like him, will find immediate relief in Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy. This is just what it was intended for. It never fails to make weak men strong and vigorous, puts new life, vim, strength, power and energy into them.

Dr. Greene's Nervura is New Life, Hope and Strength for Weak Men.

Mr. JOHN D. SMITH, electrician for the Thompson-Houston Electric Co., of Lynn, Mass., says:—"When a man has been sick and is cured, it is his duty to tell others about it, that they, too, may get well. Three years ago I had been working almost night and day, could not (at regularly) and got only a few hour sleep at night. No man can stand that long, and I soon began to be prostrated. I could not sleep when I tried, and my food would not stay on my stomach. I was in a terrible condition, and was much alarmed. I went to doctors, but they did me no good. Learning of the wonderful good done by Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy, I determined to try it. It cured me completely of all my complaints. I eat heartily and sleep well, thanks to this splendid medicine. I believe it to be the best remedy in existence."

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 18, 1901.

President McKinley very frankly tells the Senators and Representatives who call on him that if the Cubans complete and forward their Constitution to Washington within the next few weeks, as they are expected to do, he will call an extra session of the Fifty-Seventh Congress to deal with the matter, as he most positively declined to accept the responsibility of deciding it himself. This is regardless of whether the present session fails to dispose of all the important pending legislation. Only two weeks of the present Congress remains and there is a lot of work to be done to dispose of the regular appropriation bills, not to mention the oleomargarine bill which is now before the Senate; the Ship Subsidy bill, which the opposition has openly served notice shall not be voted upon; the Revenue Reduction bill, now deadlocked in Conference, owing to the refusal of the House conferees to accept the Senate amendments, and other measures of more or less importance. The work of the present week will go far towards showing whether an extra session will be made necessary, aside from the Cuban question.

Following precedent it has been decided that President McKinley will, as he succeeds himself and there will be no out-going President to ride with him, be accompanied by members of the Joint Congressional Committee, in the Inaugural parade. Members of that committee will also ride with Vice President Roosevelt. While many unique features have been announced by the Committee in charge, it is doubtful whether any single feature will attract more attention than the battalion of Porto Rican troops which will march in the parade.

Senator Elkins is trying hard to get the Committee on Commerce to agree to the Morgan amendment to the River and Harbor bill, providing for the acquirement from Costa Rica and Nicaragua of a right of way for the Nicaragua Canal. The Committee has adopted amendments providing for the storage reservoirs in some of the arid sections. The bill will be reported to the Senate early this week.

Senator Perkins has offered an amendment to the Sundry Civil Appropriation bill, providing for the laying of a cable to Hawaii, and appropriating $500,000 therefor.

In ordering that a counter-vailing duty equal in amount to the export bounties paid by those countries, be collected on all sugars imported from Russia and Belgium, Secretary Gage was merely carrying out the law as interpreted by his legal advisers. It is understood that an appeal to the Courts will be taken in the case of Russian sugar, on the ground that Russia does not pay an export bounty. Meanwhile Russia has got back at us by raising the tariff on all steel and iron products 50 per cent.

There is a rather persistent and apparently well-founded rumor around the Capitol that, owing to the large total of appropriations by the Fifty-Sixth Congress, no bills providing for public buildings will be allowed to go through at this session. This will naturally cause much dissappointment especially among those interested in public buildings that have been favorably reported.

Surgeon-General Sternberg said of the statements made by Senators Teller and Pettigrew, that there were ten thousand more men in the Philippine hospitals than could be properly taken care of: "The report is preposterous. The number of sick has ranged from seven to eight per cent. Ample hospital accommodations and plenty of medical officers have been provided for the troops in the Philippines."

How our Navy stands in Europe may be judged from the following remarks of Captain Hovegaard, of the Royal Danish Navy, who has just arrived in Washington: "My government has sent me here to study American Ship-building and especially ship-engineering. The American Navy is recognized on the European Continent, as the best without exception, the most modern, and so far as the engineering is concerned, it is looked upon as a marvel of perfection. While in this country I will try to make arrangements to have our cadets take courses in engineering and technology here."

On the recommendation of Land Commissioner Hermann, Secretary Hitchcock has made a favorable report on Senator Hansbrough's bill providing that all moneys received from the sale of public lands in the arid and semi-arid regions shall be set aside as an arid land reclamation fund for the construction of reservoirs and other hydraulic works for the storage and diversion of water. The report is accompanied by a recommendation that the bill be amended so as to provide that the lands required for reservoirs and the lands to be irrigated be withdrawn from homestead entry before their survey instead of after.

Secretary Long has gone to Pensacola, Florida, to inspect the Naval Station at that point. He will return by way of New Orleans, remaining in the latter city to see the Mardi Gras festivities.

Sunnyside.

Mrs. George Fulmer, of near Gortner, is, we are sorry to state, quite poorly.

Mrs. George Ward, of Red House community, who went last fall to a medical institution in Missouri for treatment for cancer, is much improved in health and will return home about the first of March.

Sleighing and sledding parties in and out, up and down and 'round and about have been the order of the night for some time. We think the young man who carried his sleigh bells muffled in the body of his sleigh had the best time.

Our public school, through the influence of our older and most pious, is in a very healthy and progressive condition. Our Sunday school also is in excellent working order. The origin of the success of both schools dates back through a period of twenty years. A strong influence over a community directed by a clean heart and a wise head have produced the very gratifying results that we now enjoy.

Mountain Lake Park.

A. R. Sperry and wife left the Park Wednesday for a business trip to Florida. En route they will stop off at Cincinnati. In Florida they will visit De Funick Springs and Chipley.

Manager Rudisill shipped ice to Newburg, Tunnelton and Rowlesburg the early part of the week.

Chas. Bunce has taken Mr. Sperry's place in the B. & O. office at this place.

A B. & O. surveyor was here Tuesday taking measurements for the proposed improvements.

School Examiner Browning visited the schools in this vicinity last week. Three children were suspended the past week from the Park school. The matter is to be investigated.

Four applications were received the past week for cottages for the season of 1901.

It is a pleasure to think that in three more months we will enter upon the most prosperous summer ever enjoyed at Mountain Lake Park. More people, better program, more houses built and more demand for "garden truck" than was ever known before.

Last Saturday scores of sleighs with young men and maidens were seen on our streets. They seemed happy and doubtless they were.

The West Virginia University Cadet Corps will attend the inauguration exercises, under Major J. M. Burns, U. S. A.

Senator Elkins has recommended Rev. C. B. Graham, one of our summer citizens, for appointment as chaplain U. S. A.

Twelve inch ice was cut on the lake Saturday. It was pretty ice as any one could ask for. Manager Rudisill has housed his summer supply.

Wallman.

Cold weather and lots of it.

Mrs. E. E. Clark and daughter Flossie went to Dobbin Friday and returned Sunday morning.

Mrs. Braddigan went to Gorman Sunday.

Miss Bell Hunter, of Dill, was the guest of Mrs. V. Seymour last week.

The entertainment at Gorman last Friday night proved quite a success. The hall was crowded and the actors and actresses were well trained. Excellent music was furnished by the Shillingburg orchestra. The proceeds were for a worthy cause and the people of other towns as well as Gorman showed their good will by attending. Among those who went from Wallman were Misses Lola and Mae Seymour, Effie Arnold, Bessie Seymour, Elizabeth Scharf, Bessie Littman and Messrs. George and Hal Scharf, Floyd Sollars, Emory Wolfe and Thomas Seymour.

Mrs. R. Curry was visiting her daughter, Mrs. V. Seymour, Sunday.

E. E. Clark went to Huttonville Saturday.

It is rumored that we are to have a boarding house in the near future. It certainly is badly needed and we think would be welcomed by all.

Mr. George Wolfe spent Sunday with his family in Keyser.

Frank Brumbaugh has returned from Gorman and is going to school here.

Paymaster E. G. Gibbs passed through here Monday night.

SHORTY.

Danger of Colds and La Grippe.

The greatest danger from colds and la grippe is their resulting in pneumonia. If reasonable care is used, however, and Chamberlain's Cough Remedy taken, all danger will be avoided. Among the tens of thousands who have used this remedy for these diseases we have yet to learn of a single case having resulted in pneumonia, which shows conclusively that it is a certain preventive of that dangerous malady. It will cure a cold or an attack of la grippe in less time than any other treatment. It is pleasant and safe to take. For sale by all druggists.

CANNOT DISFRANCHISE

Lawyer Says Proposed Ballot Law is Unconstitutional.

He Quotes Maryland Decisions on the Point and Supplements Them With Others.

Saturday's Baltimore News.

The following article upon the subject of the proposed changes in the election law of the State to be submitted to the extra session of the Legislature has been prepared by one of the best-known Democratic lawyers of the Baltimore bar.

It treats the subject largely from the standpoint of the Maryland law on the subject with only incidental reference to the various decisions on the same subject in the highest courts of other States. The opinion of the gentleman in question as is proposed by Mr. John P. Poe would be distinctly unconstitutional and that the Court of Appeals would so hold.

The gentleman also says that all rumors to the effect that Chief Judge Alvey of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals has advised that such a law as Mr. Poe has proposed would be constitutional are untrue and that Judge Alvey has not made any such statement.

Whether or not a ballot law can be lawfully passed by the special session of the Legislature which will indirectly and by means of one form of the ballot deprive the illiterate voter of a reasonably fair opportunity to intelligently cast his vote depends upon whether the power to pass such a law has been conferred upon the Legislature by the Constitution.

It is very clear that the Constitution is to be interpreted in a common-sense way and according to the every-day acceptation of the words, and not by any technical or artificial rule.

Chief Judge LeGrand, in delivering the opinion in State vs. Mace, 5 Md., 350, in holding that words and phrases in the State Constitution should receive the meaning ordinarialy given to them by the people who voted for its adoption and should not be interpreted in any astutely technical or artificial sense, said:

We think the Constitution ought to have a common-sense interpretation, by which we mean the sense in which it was understood by those who adopted it, and, if it received such a construction, in our judgment the term debt is to be understood as an obligation arising otherwise than from the sentence of a court for the breach of public peace or commission of a crime. Although it is a well-recognized canon of construction that where legal terms are used in a statute they are to receive their technical meaning unless the contrary plainly appears to have been the intention of the Legislature. The principle, however, does not apply to the interpretation of the organic law, which is to be construed according to the acceptation of those who adopted it.

The provisions of the Constitution regulating the right to vote are Section 1 of Article 1 of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

All elections shall be by ballot: and every male citizen of the United States of the age of 21 years or upward, who has been a resident of the State for one year, and of the Legislative district of Baltimore city, or of the county in which he may offer to vote, for six months next preceeding the election, shall be entitled to vote in the ward or election district in which he resides at all elections hereafter to be held in this State.

Article 7 of the Declaration of Rights reads as follows:

That the right of the people to participate in the Legislature is the best security of liberty and the foundation of all free government; for this purpose, elections ought to be free and frequent; and every male citizen, having the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution, ought to have the right of suffrage.

The Court of Appeals has repeatedly recognized that the plain and obvious meaning of these clauses of the Constitution was that every male citizen 21 years of age and a resident of the State and county in which he offers to vote is entitled to exercise that franchise.

For example: In answering the contention made by the Reform League that a man could not vote unless he had a fixed abode in some house, the Court of Appeals speaking through Judge Page, said in Langhammer vs. Munter, 80 Md., 526:

Probably it was borne in mind (by the framers of the Constitution) that numbers of citizens, through misfortune or otherwise, were without dwelling places, but there is no evidence to be found in any part of the Constitution that these were to be denied the privilege of the elective franchise. On the contrary, it seems to have been the purpose to confer the right of suffrage upon every male citizen who has attained the age of 21 years, only requiring, for wise reasons that every such person shall have resided in the State one year and in the voting district six months.

In his concurring opinion in Kemp vs. Owen, 76 Md. 241, Judge Bryan, in refuting a construction sought in argument to be put upon the Constitution which would prevent a man's registering in the place where he is entitled to vote for both the candidates for the House of Delegates and for a member of Congress, said.

Now if he (the voter) cannot vote for both these offices in the ward or election district where he resides, his right of suffrage is to a great extent defeated. He is deprived of one of the primal privileges of citizenship. Suppose that a literal and verbal interpretation of the language which we have quoted from the first section of the first article of the State Constitution would impair the rights of the voter, which are declared in the previous part of the same section, or would impair any of his rights under the Constitution of the United States; or would impede and embarrass the actual enjoyment of them to such an extent as virtually to defeat them; then most unquestionably such interpretation ought to be rejected. And a construction ought to be adopted which would give effect to the obvious purpose and intent of the whole section. The elective franchise is the highest right of the citizen, and the spirit of our institutions requires that every opportunity should be afforded for its fair and free exercise.

No one has ever doubted that the Legislature has the power to pass statutes making reasonable regulations of the manner in which elections shall be held and prescribing reasonable regulations as to the manner in which the voters shall exercise the right of suffrage. This right to regulate the manner in which the voting shall be done does not empower the Legislature to defeat the right altogether under color of regulating its exercise. This principle is very clearly stated by Judge McSherry in delivering the opinion of the Court of Appeals in Hooper vs. Creager, 84 Md. 247. He there, after stating that the power to regulate the manner of exercising a power could not take away the power itself, said:

It could only do this upon the assumption that the power to regulate means the power to destroy. That such is not the meaning of the term in Maryland has been determined more than once. In State vs. Mott, 61 Md., 297, an ordinance of the city of Baltimore, whereby the burning of lime within the city limits was prohibited, was sought to be upheld under that provision of the charter which gave the city authority to regulate the places for manufacturing soap and candles, etc., and where every other offensive trade is carried on. This court said: "The power delegated is simply to regulate the places where they are carried on, and not to forbid their being carried on, or to destroy them altogether." And in State vs. Whitman, 80 Md., 410, it was held that a power to regulate the liquor traffic was not a power to destroy the trade.

In speaking of the right of the Legislature to modify or change the rules of evidence by which a man's residence is to be proved, the Court of Appeals in Southerland vs. Norris, 74 Md., 328-329, speaking through Judge McSherry, said:

The qualifications of a voter in this State are prescribed by the first section of Article 1 of the Constitution of Maryland. These qualifications are that he shall be a citizen of the United States of the age of 21 years or upward, and that he shall have been a resident of the State for one year, and of the Legislative district of Baltimore city or of the county in which he offers to vote for six months next preceding the election at which he offers to vote. Before he can exercise his right to vote he must be duly registered. These qualifications, fixed by the organic law, can neither be enlarged nor curtailed by the General Assembly, but there is no provision of the Constitution, as there is no principle of constitutional law, that denies to the Legislature power to enact rules of evidence by which the facts establishing the right to vote may be proved. * * * The right to have one's controversies determined by existing rules of evidence is not a vested right These rules, like other affecting remedies, must at all times be subject to modification and control by the Legislature. * * * But the General Assembly has no power to establish rules which under pretense of regulating the presentation of evidence go so far as altogether to preclude a party from exhibiting his rights.

Therefore, it is clear from our own decisions that, while the Legislature has the undoubted power to change the form of ballot or to make any reasonable regulations for the bona fide purposes of preventing bribery, insuring secrecy and securing the fair expression of the people under a pretext of doing either of these things to adopt a law which will disfranchise voters.

The fact that, in the law which Mr. Peo suggests should be passed, provision is to be made for assistance to cripples and blind persons and to be denied illiterates would seem to render it very clear that the thinly-veiled purpose of the law is to disfranchise illiterates under the pretext of regulating the form of the ballot.

CHAPTER I.

And it came to pass, in the days when Johnsmith ruled over the land, that he gathered about him men that were great in their wisdom and mighty in their valor.

So that there was none in all the land of whom they were afraid, no, not one.

And they said unto Johnsmith, "Behold, thou hath many things to do.

"Verily, thou hath to get busy very often.

"Therefore, it is well that we do thy thinking for thee."

And they gathered about him, and placed their hands upon their brows, and turned their minds upon the affairs of the realm.

Now, there arose in their midst a man of great valor and much shrewdness

Whose name was Victor, of the tribe of Baughman.

And there was great talk in the land that it would be a smooth deal to stack the cards so that they who wished to choose the rulers thereof should receive the double cross,

And the gold brick.

And the green goods, as it were.

But none of Johnsmith's advisers, nor even Johnsmith himself, was willing to suggest the dark lantern and jimmy act.

Now, therefore, arose Victor, of the tribe of Baughman, who was called a General.

And he put on his armor, which was rich in gold and sparkled with the sparkle jewels.

And he girded about him his sword and tossed his mustache about his face and made speech unto the men who print the papers, saying:

"Surely the land is up against it, for they that cannot read the Democratic ticket are likely to choose the Republican side,

"Now, therefore, let us call together the men who make the laws for the land, and let us make a law that all men who would help us choose a ruler shall be men who can read,

"Also, men who can write,

"But let us have it that the figuring may be conducted by those who count the ballots."

Now, all the people lifted up their voices and said in one voice: "Not much.

"Behold, we want none of this in ours."

But Victor, of the tribe of Baughman, replied: "Go to, for ye know not what ye want."

And Johnsmith said: "Wait a little. Wait a little.

"Verily, two of my cohorts are ill and could not vote for this law if we tried to pass it.

"Now, therefore, let me make up my mind while they are getting well."

And when the twain were well, behold Johnsmith made him a decree and caused it to be posted in the four corners of the land, saying:

"Behold, let all the people know that we are going to fix things for them."

And he made it to read that they would do many things, hoping that he might work in the favored scheme during the rush.

And all the people winked with the eye and smiled in the sleeves of their garments, saying unto themselves:

"Verily, Johnsmith knoweth not that we have seen the three shell game on the fair grounds."

But Johnsmith heard them not, being busy with his garmentmaker, who was taking his measure for a toga, such as is worn in the Senate.

CHRIST IN THE ISLANDS.

Chaplain Miller Believes in Keeping the Philippines.

Monday's Washington Post.

Waugh Methodist Church was crowded yesterday morning with a congregation of eager listeners to a sermon upon the subject, "Our Flag in the Philippines," by Chaplain Oliver C. Miller. Mr. Miller is a forceful speaker, and his remarks came after lengthy and severe experience in the far-away Pacific islands.

Rev. Mr. Miller was in the Philippines for fourteen months, and returned to America because of the oncoming of a third attack of fever. He was chaplain of the Fourth Cavalry under Gen. Lawton, and was with that gallant officer until the time of his death. Later Mr. Miller was with the command of General MacArthur, and advanced with him as far as Angeles. He served with Gen. Young around Luzon. During the latter part of his service Rev. Miller was sent by Gen. Bates into the Southernmost islands of the archipelago.

The text yesterday morning was "Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations; spare not, lengthen thy cords and strengthen thy stakes;" and "We will rejoice in thy salvation and in the name of our God we will set up our banners, the Lord fulfill all thy petitions."

Mr. Miller is a devout believer in the present American policy in the Philippines. He said national expansion was taught in the Gospel, as shown by his text. He holds that the American nation at large is sadly in need of information. He said it was the duty of the church to go into every land and teach the Gospel, and that our country had to make this possible. In this light, said the chaplain, the Philippine matter should be regarded.

"Think what it has cost America to keep the glorious flag afloat," said the minister. "It has been baptized again and again in the blood of heroes. One of the greatest blessings that ever came to this nation was the Spanish-American war. Our nation was becoming enfeebled by lack of sacrifice. If any one is to blame for the raising of the flag in the Philippines it is Jesus Christ, and who lives that will cast blame upon Him? Let us as His people take orders as orders. The Captain of salvation gives us our orders to go forward and we go.

"The church now has an opportunity to do missionary work as never before offered. It is the duty of all to take hold of the lever, the fulcrum of which lies in the islands of the Philippines. A lot of week-kneed people, unlike Joshua, say: 'Stay at home,' when God says: 'Go.' Does God open great doors for nothing?

"On these islands of ours lives a people who have struggled upward under oppression for years. They are not ignorant, dull, or stupid; but, on the other hand, quick to learn and easy to teach. These Filipinos are designed to accomplish the transmission of the gospel of Christ to the heathen."

Rev. Miller paid Gen. Bates a hearty tribute for his foresightedness, and everlasting debt of gratitude for his services. He told of the exposures suffered by the American soldiers, and said they needed encouragement and praise rather than criticism and fault-finding. Dr. Miller told of his feelings when, upon returning to America, he heard how the soldiers and officers had been lied about. Washington, he declared, is neither as moral nor as temperate as Manila. There are fewer saloons in Manila in proportion to its population, than in any large city in this country. The Filipinos are a moral people. Seldom is infidelity known between husband and wife, and when such is the case a severe punishment is provided. We ourselves must begin great preparations at home, for we are held up before these people as an example.

"How could we have relieved our citizens in China if God, in His mercy, had not given us a station in the Philippines? People who have made up their minds against the Philippines must be disloyal to the glorious flag of Washington and Lincoln. When the nation decides on a policy there should be no politics concerned therein. When you speak against the flag, you speak against God's instrument in the civilization of the world. God has work in China. The day is coming when those false gods must fall. More heathens are born into the world every day than ever converted, but God is coming again.

"We cannot blame the Filipinos for being suspicious of the Americans for the time. They were oppressed for years and their minds poisoned by the Spanish soldiery before the latter were transported back to Spain by this government.

"Our country had an awful spell of generosity when we sent those soldiers home, and still another spell of it when we bought those islands. God gave this country the Philippine Islands. We must not criticise, however. Our nation coming into the new relationship was more than likely to make mistakes. May every one of us this day be inspired to uphold that precious, starry banner, that it shall never suffer dishonor, and never, never be furled where God in His judgment has once placed it."

Washington Birthday Exercises.

An exercise in honor of Washington's Birthday was given by the pupils of Crellin school on Thursday afternoon, February 21st. Many of the patrons and friends of the school were present. Mr. Jack Smith, one of our visitors, favored us with some excellent music on the violin.

The following program was rendered in a creditable manner:

"My Country 'tis of Thee," school; alphbetical exercise, sixteen boys; instrumental duet, Clyde and Jack Smith; words of Washington, ten girls; a toast by Franklin, Cleveland Ashby; Washington's embarrasment, Joe Ashby; vocal duet, Misses Shaffer and Ashby; speeches for small patriots, three boys; like Washington, Brydon Frantz; violin solo, Jack Smith; something better, Merl Browning; our flag, Miss Maud Whitmore; "Marching through Georgia," school.

A MAN AND A BEAR.

By Frederick Boyd Stevenson.

THE chatter of the city men bothered Celia. They talked horse—that annoyed her. They all knew the celebrities of the stage and foisted their knowledge upon her. These were the masculine men. As for the others—the tennis players and such—they were quite as bad.

"Oh, dear me!" sighed Celia, "I shall leave them all."

So she shook her dainty skirts free from the city's dust. She packed her seven large trunks, and went to a hamlet so insignificant and so obscure that the chorographic experts failed to indicate its latitude and longitude.

The big fellow who paced restlessly up and down in the rooms of the Fifth Avenue club was rather good looking. At least most of the women would have so regarded him. He was tall and dark and athletic; and best of all he was young and full of the ambitions of life. His whole aim at the time in question, however, seemed to be to wear a pathway in the velvet carpet of the club's reception room. Some men do their thinking lying on the flat of their backs. Others seek the solitude of the black forests, and there, alone with themselves and nature, evolve the mighty problems that wrest empires from rulers or twist fortunes out of Wall street on the turn of the wheat market. There are still others who endeavor to arouse the sluggish molecules in the gray matter of their brains by walking—ceaselessly and tirelessly—promenading the corridors and the halls of dwellings, tramping through the crowded thoroughfares, ever pushing onward, jarring the nerves of their friends, and giving rise to the belief that they are attacked with a species of locomotor ataxia.

But Grayson was not afflicted with any nervous disorders. On the contrary he didn't seem to have nerves. The only thing that bothered him was where he should spend his vacation which had been somewhat delayed on account of pressing business during the early months of the summer.

"I am tired of the seaside resorts and the silly women who flock there," soliloquized Grayson. "And those trips to Europe bore one so."

He had gone over the entire list many times.

"What I need is rest," said he, "a quiet rest away from people."

And then it was that an idea came and Grayson stopped his long and irritating walk. So it happened that night when a friend saw him on the platform of the station, surrounded by queer-looking boxes and fishing tackle and guns, and propounded the query: "Where away?" that the answer came: "To the Maine woods."

On the second day of Horace Grayson's stay at the old farm house there was quite a flutter of excitement about the place. And it was all because a young woman was expected to arrive that evening.

"I thought you told me," said Grayson, somewhat ruefully, "that I was to be the only boarder here this summer, and now you are getting a young lady from the city. Do you think that is quite right? And I left the city and remained away from the seaside and the resorts in Europe just to be rid of people, and especially young ladies."

The old farmer rubbed the thin crop of whiskers on his chin in an embarrassed way.

"It is hardly fair," he said, "but I calculate, Mister Grayson, you'll not be put out much. You see this young woman knows some of my wife's relations and they sent word she was coming unexpected like jest yesterday."

There was no help for Grayson, so he determined to make the best of it. "I will be hunting and fishing," said he, "and I can keep out of her way."

Just after supper he heard Farmer Johnson discussing his troubles with his wife.

"I don't see," the old man was saying, "how in the world, Selina, thet young woman is to be met at the depot. Jake's gone off to see his sick mother and will not be back till tomorrer and I'm all crippled up with that sprain."

Grayson chuckled to himself.

"What business has a city woman up in these woods, anyhow?" he thought. Then a sense of his duty and his natural gallantry came over him and also a little plan that was purely selfish, and which appealed to him as being very clever. So he said:

"Mr. Johnson, I will go for the young lady on one condition."

The old man's face beamed.

"What is thet?" asked he.

"Let me take the place of Jake, your hired man. And when Jake comes back let me be your other hired man, John."

"I'll do it," ejaculated Farmer Johnson, "by gum, I'll do it," and his good wife, who attended church regularly and was generally elected president of the quilting society during the winter season, looked at him hard for this, to her, uncalled for expletory expression. As a matter of fact the old lady was rather averse to the deception, but Grayson was firm and the exigencies of the occasion demanded some action, so she gave a reluctant consent, stipulating, however, that the masquerade was to be an unostentatious one, and that its sanction on her part was to be of an entirely tacit character.

"Remember," cried Grayson, clad in hickory shirt and blue jeans, as he gayly drove out of the farmyard gate, "remember, my name is John."

II.

There was a bit of the desolate in the scene at the backwoods station that night when the train which had borne Miss Celia Dorchester thither glided down the long snaky track toward civilization, leaving behind it a trail of black curling smoke out of the engine's smokestack—emblematic of woe and loneliness.

The seven big trunks were side by side on the platform, and, in the fading dusk, Miss Dorchester could just discern a look of anxiety on the face of the man who had come to meet her; an anxiety which had its origin in a mental endeavor to determine the best mode and means of transferring the appalling accumulation of luggage to the rather cumbersome vehicle which had been drawn up to the roadside.

"You will find these trunks pretty heavy, I am afraid," said Celia.

"Yes," said the man, as he backed the wagon to the edge of the platform and lifted on the trunks with apparent ease.

During the five-mile ride over the soft dirt road the man was to all appearances as little interested in Miss Dorchester as that young woman was interested in him. The wheels of the wagon made small rifts in the brown sand, thin clouds of which followed the paintless spokes half way around their gyrations and fell back again after the manner of water in a millway. The wagon swung with a lateral, monotonous motion, emitting a droning sound which resembled the creaking of a boom on the spar of a yacht. Aside from this and the chirping of a cricket from a near-by meadow, there was nothing to break the oppressive stillness. Somehow or other Miss Dorchester could not keep from her mind the lights of Broadway.

"Is it far to Johnson's?" she asked, although she had been already informed with much particularity as to the exact distance.

"Five miles," said the man, and he made a clip at the horses with the whip that caused them to spring forward with so much enthusiasm as to nearly result in the loss of Miss Dorchester's new summer hat.

"Oh!" cried Celia, and then a moment later, when she had regained her composure, she asked:

"Will it take us long to reach there?"

When the horse got down to trotting paces again the man said: "No, ma'am."

* * *

Celia enjoyed rambling through the dense woods alone. The people at the house had warned her against going too far.

"You might get lost," said Farmer Johnson, "and then you know, Miss, the Maine forests are not entirely free from bears."

Miss Dorchester laughed.

"I am not afraid of the bears," said she. "I am afraid of nothing except men," and then she added, as she noted the puzzled look of her host—"I mean young men, you know. Just keep the young men away from me and I am willing to take my chances with the bears."

She had only seen the man who had driven her from the station a few times. On these occasions he had nodded good-naturedly, but did not seem at all inclined to become better acquainted with her. He was always busy cleaning a gun or arranging fishing tackle. Of course she didn't care, but she had so much time on her hands that she sometimes wondered if he were one of the hired men, or the old farmer's son, but she was too highly cultured and had too high a sense of her own dignity to ask any questions about him. He sat down to the table with the others of the family—all the hired men in the country do that—and on these occasions she had endeavored to draw him out—just to relieve her ennui. He did not seem much inclined to talk, but when she, with considerable adroitness, had placed him in what she considered a close corner in a conversational way, she was surprised at the ease with which he extricated himself and left her very seriously entangled in the net which she had set. For the first time in her life she found herself embarrassed by a man, and she was not backward in hiding her confusion by once more affirming her hatred of the entire sterner sex, and, on this particular occasion, drawing no invidious distinctions between specimens bucolic or metropolitan.

As for Grayson, he simply smiled in that cynical way of his and strolled down to the stream with fishing rod in hand.

III.

Miss Dorchester did not see Grayson for three days after that, and then he had his gun thrown across his broad shoulders and was tramping off towards the woods. Celia took the opposite direction and was soon lost to view. The forest had an unusual charm for her that morning and she ignored the admonition of her host and walked farther and farther away from the farmhouse. At length, overcome from her exertions, she sat down on a log. A pretty green vine trailed gracefully around it. At her feet a tiny stream rippled over smooth pebbles. Her hat had fallen to her side and the soft, cool air lulled her into drowsiness.

Her head had fallen forward and she was on the point of sleeping when she was suddenly aroused by the sharp snapping of a dry twig. Her first thought was that someone from the house was approaching, but looking in the direction whence the sound came, she saw, standing erect like a man, a huge black bear.

She gave a little scream and started to her feet. For a moment beauty and the beast stood face to face. Then, unmindful of her hat, Celia sprang across the stream with a bound. The bear, with widely extended jaws, showing his great white teeth, fell down on all fours, and with a lumbering motion, sped after her, breaking down the underbrush that was in his way with a loud crackling noise. Miss Celia, wild with terror, ran through the forest. Close behind her came the bear, gaining every step. The woman's dress was torn by the brambles. Her hair had fallen down and was flying in disorder. Again and again she fell across fallen branches that beset her path. And all the time the bear was getting nearer and nearer. She cried for help and the dark forest sent back her voice in mocking echoes. A deep gully lay before her and at the bottom she saw a winding creek, which she knew she could never cross. A dizziness was coming over her. Her pursuer was only a few feet behind her. She could hear him panting and could almost feel his hot breath. Her foot caught in a bit of withered moss and she fell. She heard the sharp report of a gun and then a darkness came before her.

"You will soon be all right, Miss."

Jake, the hired man, was kneeling by her side, moistening her lips with water from a hunting cup. A few feet away a big black bear was stretched out on the green sward. The young woman looked first at the man, then at the smoking gun, and then at the man again. Somehow she was disappointed. She half wished her rescuer had been Grayson. While it provoked her to think that this man with his quiet, indifferent way, had, with all her flippancy and repartee, shown his will and his wit to be the stronger of the two, still she could not but feel her interest growing in him. The knowledge that a man is stronger than a woman at first calls forth her envy; later it evokes her admiration. Celia suddenly remembered that she had not yet thanked this other man for his timely rescue.

"I want to thank you, Mister—Mister—" she began.

"My name is Jake," said the man.

"I want to thank you, Mister Jake, for your kindness in saving my—my—"

"Oh, never mind that, Miss," said Jake.

"But I do mind it. I don't see how you were ever so fine a shot as to kill that bear."

"Oh, 'tis nothing," said Jake, "I have killed many of them. I never miss 'em."

At that moment there was a shrill whistle and a deep, gruff voice called out:

"Tara, Tara, get up!"

The black bear arose to his hind legs, and shaking himself, gave a grunt or two and ambled away in the direction of a picturesquely-attired man who had just emerged from the edge of the forest. Miss Dorchester and Jake looked on in dumb astonishment to see the bear arise apparently from the dead. Both turned inquiringly to the one who had whistled for an explanation. He evidently understood what they meant, for he grinned and said:

"Huh! Me train de bear. He dance; he hop; he run. Me shoot gun; he make believe fall dead. Bear he run away. Me hear man shoot gun. Me scart bear be dead. But no harm. Man he no can shoot good. Come, Tara, come, Tara!" and the bear and his master walked slowly away.

"Quite a romantic rescue."

Miss Dorchester looked up and saw Grayson standing before her. He had her hat in his hand and as he handed it to her he said:

"That fellow in the outlandish costume belongs to a band of gypsies who have been encamped near here all summer. They are catching bears and training them for exhibition in the towns. This one that frightened you so badly had evidently escaped."

Miss Dorchester made no immediate reply. She felt very foolish, for Grayson had surprised her in a most ridiculous situation. She tried to smile; then she cried, and turning quickly away said, hysterically: "I just hate men!"

* * *

After that Miss Dorchester felt differently toward Grayson. When she sought a woman's relief—tears—in the forest that day, the whole nature of the man seemed to change. He became sympathetic and kind. He helped her pin up her torn frock; he brushed off her hat, and he did many other little things that consoled her. On the walk home explanations were exchanged. A few days after that she put out her hand to him and said:

"Good-by, Mr. Grayson, I am going to my home in New York to-morrow."

He took her hand in both of his and held it firmly.

"I am going to my home, too, Celia," he said. "We will go together."

She blushed as he called her by her first name, but with the old spirit she said:

"Oh, dear, and I came here to be rid of the city men. I told you I hated men, and now I am going home with one."

"And I hated the city women and came here to rough it in the Maine woods so as to be quit of them," he said. "But here is one of them whom I do not hate."

His arm was around her now and he had drawn her close to him. She gently disengaged herself and smiled as she said:

"I do not hate all the city men," and he bent down and kissed her.—Radford Review.

THE ONLY ENGLISH POPE.

Monument to Be Erected to Breakspeare in Rome After Eight Hundred Years.

At last the only Englishman who ever sat on the papal throne seems to be about to receive honor from his own countrymen, if not in his own country. The project is now on foot to erect a monument in St. Peter's to Nicholas Breakspeare, Adrian IV., which will be worthy of him and England. The only other Englishmen who have a monument in the Vatican Basilica are the two last Stuart pretenders, who were commemorated in marble by the great Canova, but the genii who guard the tomb offended the hypersensitive modesty of Leo XII., who had them draped, says a Rome correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette.

The site for the new monument has not been mentioned, as the scheme is as yet only a scheme, started through the enterprise of Mr. Griselle, of Oxford, who hopes to raise sufficient funds among English Catholics, especially those who are now on pilgrimage in Rome and those resident in the Eternal City. The design of the monument is already in existence, having been made centuries ago, and has waited all this time for some one to execute it. The pontiff and ecclesiastical authorities look with great benevolence on this project, which really seems likely to be carried out.

Nicholas Breakspeare was a most interesting man. He was born of poor parents, in 1100, at Langley, near St. Albans, and, although he wished to enter an English monastery, the request was refused. He then went abroad and rose from honor to honor until, at the age of 54, he was elected to the chair of St. Peter. It was he who conferred the sovereignty of Ireland upon England, and it was he who procured the execution of the celebrated Arnold of Brescia. To his account must be laid the beginning of the long and bitter feud of the papacy with the house of Hohenstaufen. He had a personal struggle with Frederick Barbarossa—who refused to hold his stirrup for him to mount his horse—which resulted in a complete victory for the English pope. In 1159, the quarrel having gathered volume, he was about to excommunicate Frederick, when he died, and Frederick thus escaped what, at that time, was almost a matter of life and death.

And this man, to whom emperors bowed, has had to wait 800 years for his monument!

Few Birds in Texas Since Big Storm.

By those who live in the rural districts, as well as observing townspeople, the scarcity of birds since the September storm is frequently the subject of remark. Before the storm the woods around Brenham swarmed with birds of 20 kinds and the town was literally alive with English sparrows. There are now very few of the latter seen and the chirp of a bird in the swamp or woodland is rarely heard. The generally accepted theory of their disappearance is that the smaller kinds were dislodged from their perches by that awful gale and beaten to death in the brush and against the ground and trees. In support of this theory it may be said that the morning after the storm hundreds of sparrows were dead in the court house plaza here, and at the base of every brick wall scores could be seen. There is no doubt that they were blown against the wall with sufficient force to kill them.—Galveston News.

Profit in Pennies.

Pennies do not consist of copper alone, there being in them two per cent. of tin and three per cent. of zinc to 95 per cent. of copper. They cost the government about 42 cents a pound exclusive of stamping and there are 148 in a pound, so that the government makes a fair profit on every pound minted, since, while they are redeemable in gold, but few are ever presented.—Washington Star.

IRON ORE FIELDS RICH.

Great Northern Railway Will Develop Deposits in Cascade Mountains.

Development of iron ore deposits of Washington will be commenced this year. Iron of high grade has been known to exist for many years, but little attention has been given to the subject because of lack of capital.

High officials of the Great Northern railway have now take up the matter. Lyon Case, the Minnesota iron expert, was sent to the state last spring and spent the summer investigating the iron ore fields tributary to the Seattle & Northern railway, recently acquired by the Great Northern; another and larger deposit was found a few miles north of Madison, on the Great Northern.

It is stated that President Hill is giving personal attention to the question of establishing a rolling and steel rail mill in the state, the present high price of rails offering an unusual inducement for such an enterprise.

What left him void of reason and control?
A chattering, idiotic shape? A ruined soul?
What drove the sparkle from those eyes?
What loosed that maudlin tongue?
What caused that hectic flush to rise,
That hectic flush and nerve unstrung?

What banished pity from that breast?
What lulled that conscience to its rest?
What kindled but to waste that brain?
What quickened but to clog the mind?
What dyed the cheek to leave the stain?
Of guilt and shame behind?

What fanned the latent fires of hate
To fury's maddened state?
What aimed the deadly blow
The helpless hand must strike?
The blow that fell on friend or foe,
On friend or foe alike.

WORK FOR GIRLS.

They Alone Can Make Wine Drinking Unfashionable and Aid Temperance Cause.

J. G. Holland wrote in Mrs. Hayes' album these words: "Women only can make wine-drinking unfashionable, and heal the nation of this curse."

What did Dr. Holland mean by "women only?" Is it true that only women can make wine-drinking unfashionable and heal the nation of this curse? You and I need to know this first; because if only we women can do this thing, why, it is an awful responsibility upon us, each one of us. And if some one else can do it, we, like all others, would like to give that somebody else the job. Mrs. Hayes became mistress of the white house, and it was for her to say what the social atmosphere should be which surrounded her guests, and how they should be entertained at her house. Well, she did an unheard of thing. She banished wine from all her entertainments, with just one exception. Secretary Evarts made a fuss. He was mortified. He could not endure to have Lord and Lady English, Count and Countess French, Baron and Baroness German, come to the white house dinners and have nothing fit for them to drink—not a drop of poison. It was too utterly queer! So Mrs. Hayes made one exception in favor of those great foreign highnesses, and only for once. Her conscience—high-souled woman that she was—smote her for that little cowardly compromise with wrong. She could better endure to have Secretary Evarts and the Smiths ashamed of her, than to be ashamed of herself. So she quietly and forever after prohibited wine from her table, and cheerfully endured the lifted eyebrows and shrugged shoulders of the diplomats, British, French, Russian, all, and the little short-lived hiss of "fashionable" society until that hiss turned to a cheer, and fashionable society turned round, like the spaniel it is, and trotted on behind its mistress. It became unfashionable to serve wine and to offer wine in fashionable society while Mrs. Hayes was in the white house.

What Mrs. Hayes did in the white house every woman can do in her own home, if she will. If the girls who read these words will each of them, altogether, use their influence on the side of temperance, thy can make temperance fashionable where they are. Will you do it?

Gen. Grant did a manly thing in refusing to drink wine everywhere and in all society. It is only a strong man who can keep his wine glass upside down—in this case right-side up, too—while all the grand people around him are sipping champagne and toasting each other in sparkling drinks. No one can tell how "far this little candle sheds its light." But no man can do for a fashion in society what a woman can. It is women only, as Dr. Holland said.

I wish some strong, bright angel stood before you just now, while you read, girls, to flash before you, as no words of mine can, the power you possess to help or to hinder, the cause of temperance; to make you feel your responsibility, because you are girls, in this matter; to shudder at its weight, and to never cease trying to fulfill it! Doubtless you have heard a great deal about the value of your smiles; but do you know the value of your frowns? I wish I could make you feel the value of your frowns and the importance of knowing just what to frown upon. What a man must do by a blow, a woman can do by a frown. When the time comes that the young man who now shares his time in your society and the saloon, who jokes about temperance in your presence and takes a glass socially now and then, is made to feel that these things cannot be if you are to be his companion at party, ride or church; that good society cannot tolerate these things in its members; in short, that this kind of a man is unfashionable and unpopular, then alcohol will tremble on its throne, and the liquor traffic will hide its cancerous face.—Rose Elizabeth Cleveland, in Presbyterian Banner.

"Solid Beer."

One of the recent inventions tried on the British soldiers in South Africa is called "solid beer." It is a jelly made from malt and hops, from which beer can be made anywhere and fermented. It is said to make excellent beer and to work equally well in hot or cold climates, the process being very simple. The military authorities have reported favorably upon it.

A TEMPERANCE MONKEY.

Offered a Drink of Whisky He Turns Disgustedly Away and Is Decorated with a White Ribbon.

"I had the pleasure, some weeks since," writes Mary E. Voorhees, "of being on a steamer coming up from the south. The captain's young son had a monkey, a great pet, and we were often entertained with his funny pranks and astonished at his good sense. One day, after feeding him a number of things, some one went to the bar and brought a glass of whisky. As soon as the monkey saw it, with delight sparkling in his eyes he put out both hands to bring the glass to his lips; but as he smelled the contents he pushed the glass away with a plain look of disgust on his face. The men again tried to force him to drink. Finally some one brought a small tea roll, put it in the glass and when moist with spirits put it to the monkey's lips; but he turned his head from side to side to avoid the smell, with the same look of disgust as before.

"I then said: 'Gentlemen, I am sorry to see you torture that dumb brute. You should have great respect for his very lofty principles. He evidently has more sense than nine-tenths of men, who ruin body and soul with the vile stuff. I call that monkey a temperance monkey, and will honor him before you.'

"Going to my stateroom, I brought out a piece of white ribbon, and mid the cheers of all present tied it round the monkey's neck. The young owner then marched his pet off in great glee and triumph."

HE PUSHED THE GLASS AWAY.

This queer monkey, like the old-time jester, in the midst of his buffoonery threw out a strong bit of wisdom, remarks the Union Signal. Let us hope that the temperance lesson sank deep into the hearts of those present, and that all who wear the white ribbon may prove as resolute and firm in time of temptation as did this pet monkey.

A SIGNIFICANT FACT.

Successful Drummers and Especially Whisky and Wine Salesmen Are Total Abstainers.

A recent number of Barrels and Bottles, an official organ of the retail liquor dealers, contains the following from a man who is on the road for a big New York firm of liquor importers:

"Traveling men have to be good fellows, of course, and this involves usually a liberal amount of drinking, but you will probably be surprised when I tell you that the traveling men who drink the least are those who themselves sell liquors. Many of the whisky and wine drummers of the country are total abstainers, and there are as many others who make it a rule never to take a drink before five o'clock in the evening. This is simply one of the necessities of business. When I go to a place like Kansas City, for instance, I call during the day on a dozen liquor jobbers who import their wines and whiskies through my house. Suppose I made a practice of drinking with my customers. At each place where I call I would probably take four or five drinks, and the result would be that before I had finished my day's work I would have to be dumped into a carriage and hauled back to the hotel. At every wholesale house where I call I am sure to be invited to drink. The invitation comes with as much certainty as 'Good-morning,' or 'How do you do?'

"When I say that liquor salesmen are not, as a rule, drinkers, I must make one exception; that is the champagne salesman. It is his business to drink and drink hard; and the consequence is that while good champagne salesmen command good salaries they do not last long. The champagne salesman must introduce his brand of goods directly to the drinkers. He must not only see that it is for sale in the high-grade saloons, hotels and cafes, but he must see that the drinkers who visit these places learn to call for his particular brand. I never knew of a champagne drummer whose salary was smaller than $9,000 a year and expenses. The expenses usually amount to as much if not more than the salary. As a result, champagne salesmen are not old men. They usually break down and are forced to give up before they reach middle ge. Rheumatism or gout strikes them, and then younger men take their places."

Vice Crusade in Chicago.

The crusade against vice in Chicago continues to gather momentum, and disreputable places which have flourished without molestation for years have been thoroughly cleaned out, says the Union Signal. The failure of saloonkeepers to comply with the midnight closing ordinance has been followed by immediate arrest, and it is said that the fines imposed will be so heavy as to leave no doubt of the seriousness of the intention to enforce the law. Mayor Harrison will advocate the enactment of an ordinance which will abolish private dining-rooms in restaurants, asserting that these are more dangerous to respectable young women than the basement dives.

COMING MOTIVE POWER.

Prof. C. A. Bobrick, University of St. Petersburg, Declares It Will Be Liquid Air.

Most useful and certainly the most promising aspirant for twentieth century glory, is liquid air. Its possibilities are so colossal that the dreamer may speculate to his heart's content, and yet not wander beyond the bounds of reasonable probability. What has been already proved with regard to this new great force only forecasts the wonders that will be accomplished by its aid after a few decades.

For instance, I firmly believe that liquid air will be the means of transmitting the power of Niagara Falls to distant points.

Actual experiments prove that the resistance of a copper wire to the electric current at the temperature of liquid air (312 degrees below zero F.) is less than one per cent. of its resistance at 212 degrees above zero F. Part of the power of Niagara falls will, I believe, be converted into electricity, and part into liquid air. The liquid air under high pressure will be used for cooling the electric conduit incased in a well-insulated pipe.

Automobiles propelled by liquid air are already flying through the streets of New York, and liquid air will solve the problem of aerial and submarine navigation, for not only can a greater amount of power be carried in a small space and at less weight than any other power known, but the exhaust from the engines will furnish a pure, dry, highly oxygenated fresh air for breathing.

Before the century is half gone ice for household use will be a curiosity. Liquid air will be delivered from house to house in cans, just as the milkman delivers his wares every morning for daily consumption.

In chemical science the possibilities are illimitable; chemicals will approach absolute purification by the crystillization process of separation, recombination of the component parts and the elimination of the impure ingredients.—Chicago Times-Herald.

WALKS ON THE WATER.

German Inventor Has Constructed "Water Skis" with Which He Performs Strange Feats.

An ingenious device for walking on water has been invented by Capt. Grossman, of Cologne, Germany. He has called his apparatus "water skis," and he has shown that he can accomplish with them as much on some of the more turbulent waves and falls of the Rhine as the Norwegians can with their snow skis on the steep mountains of the north.

Capt. Grossmann's water skis are two plain cylinders made of aluminum, 13 feet long. They are so light that they can easily be carried on the shoulders on terra firma, like a pair of big oars. The skis are propelled by the treading of the feet, which keep four oar-shaped wings in constant motion. Capt. Grossmann saved 20 lives during a recent flood. It is claimed for this apparatus that it is much more easily manipulated in rough weather than most life-saving boats.

Liverpool Is Burning Peat.

In view of the exorbitant price of coal in this country, says the Liverpool Daily Post, Ireland is likely to benefit greatly this winter. "Turf, black turf," as the old Irish song says, is already a rather common feature in the fuel supply of Liverpool, and recently, for the first time in history, a load of peat was delivered at a loading place of business in the Exchange building. The carts resemble the Galway turf carts, and capacity is about the same. A Galway cart—a small load, it is true—costs five shillings six pence. The turf is warm and comfortable. There seems to be a chance springing up for Ireland that she never had before.

Wonders of the Corn Plant.

Assuming that there are 20 leaves two and one-half inches wide and 30 inches long on a corn plant and that there are three plants in a hill on 40 acres, counting 3,240 hills per acre, the number of square feet of surface presented by the leaves would be 4,050,000, equal to nearly 95 acres, which area the blades would cover as a carpet if placed side by side. This calculation does not take into account additional surface which naturally would be present in a field of corn.—Farmers' Voice.

Driest Place in the World.

The driest place in the world is that of Egypt between the two lower falls of the Nile. Rain has never been known to fall there, and the inhabitants do not believe travelers when told that water falls from the sky.

ELECTRIC TIME ALARM.

It Is Attached to the Bed and Keeps On Ringing Until the Sleeper Gets Up to Stay.

When the bell of an ordinary alarm clock begins to ring the sleeper is apt to wake up sufficiently to think it will stop soon and as he is not compelled to arise and stop it the result is often another nap, with its consequent delays throughout the day. This objection has led to the designing of the continuous ringing alarm, of which several are already in use. The electric alarm, which we show in the accompanying picture, has just been patented by Simon Wolf, of Essen, Germany, and has at least one novelty to recommend it. It is directly connected to the bed and it is impossible for the sleeper to stop it until he gets up to stay. Underneath the bed is a series of contact points, one of which is shown in the picture, the weight of the person forcing them together. A clock is used in connection with the apparatus, and as soon as the hour of rising is indicated the remaining opening or break in the wire is closed, the current passing through the contact points underneath the bed and causing the bell to ring continuously until the sleeper, by leaving the bed, breaks the circuit. Should he lie down again the circuit is again completed and the bell rings until the second rising.

AN AMERICAN PRODUCT.

Excelsior Is a Commodity in Itself and the Source of a Profitable National Industry.

"Excelsior, an American invention which is extensively used for packing purposes and in the manufacture of bedding and various other upholstery uses, is not, as is generally believed, made from shavings," said a wholesale dealer in the material. "It is an article of regular manufacture, and between 35,000 and 40,000 tons of the curling wood fiber are turned out by the eastern and western lumber mills annually.

"Basswood and poplar are the woods used in the production. The logs are sawed into lengths of 18 inches, which is the length of a fiber of excelsior. These blocks are split in halves and the wood is properly seasoned. Excelsior is made of different degrees of coarseness and fineness of fiber. In the manufacture a series of knife points run down in parallel lines that are spaced according to the width of the fiber to be made. A following knife slices off the whole face of the block thus served. The fibers curl and commingle as the knife sets them free. An excelsior machine makes 200 to 300 strokes a minute, every stroke cutting off a tier of fiber across the face of the block. The usual commercial package of excelsior is a bale weighing about 50 pounds. At wholesale excelsior sells at from $16 to $40 a ton.

"American excelsior is exported to Central America, to the West Indies, to England, and other foreign countries, where several thousand tons of the fiber are shipped yearly."—Washington Star.

GERMS IN CLOTHING.

Diphtheria, Scarlet Fever and Some Other Diseases Are Readily Conveyed in Woolens.

One of the medical journals tells of a recent funeral at East Baltimore, Md. A child had died from diphtheria, and the mother, having no mourning clothes of her own, borrowed from a neighbor. A few days after the garments were returned diphtheria broke out in the other family. Such cases are not unusual. Too great pains cannot be taken to avoid infection where there is a case of this disease. The germs of diphtheria, scarlet fever and some other diseases are readily conveyed by clothing.

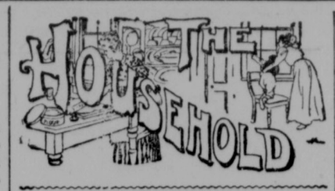
Here is another illustration of the fact: An infant of tender age died of scarlet fever. Some of its long clothes, which were handsomely embroidered, were laid aside. A year or two later another infant was born to the same parents, and was dressed in the same clothes. This child, too, was stricken with fever and died. To the parents the event was a mystery, but many other people understood the affair. In all such cases, though, one cannot but wish that the attending physician had warned the families in which these illnesses occurred against the danger of infection.

Lyddite Proves a Failure.

The high explosive lyddite, which has been used extensively by the British in the South African war, is now said to have been deficient in several important respects, and it is asserted that few of the shells fired from the field pieces exploded satisfactorily.

Steel Used by Railroads.

Railways use up over 2,000,000 tons of steel a year—almost half the world's product.



WOOD FOR ART LOVERS.

Big Prices Paid by Americans for Beds, Tables and Chairs Made of Genuine Teak.

The eastern disturbance has been productive in our peaceful American cities of large sales of all sorts of embroideries, carvings, bronzes and furniture of Chinese manufacture.

Only a small quantity of the black and red carved Chinese wood has found its way far into the United States, for Americans have only recently begun to appreciate its beauty and its especial adaptability to our country houses. There is now a demand for it, though it fetches as handsome prices as the best old mahogany—Chinese teak is what the householder desires in preference to what comes from Bombay. Bombay teak is a softer wood and most elaborately carved in rather meretricious patterns, while the furniture makers of Canton use only the ruddy ironwood of Tonquin, which, in its natural state, is the color of our rosewood, and which when dry is as hard as metal. From time immemorial the cabinet makers of Canton have fashioned this beautiful wood in the pure Chinese shapes, carving it while the sap still ran in the fiber and seasoning it afterward and making beds, tables, chairs, tea stands, sofas, etc., for the mandarins.

Sometimes the ironwood was left in its natural red-brown color, highly oiled and polished, and then inlaid with mother-of-pearl or ivory, and always, in place of any trifling upholstery, for the seat and back of chair or sofa and for tops of tables, handsome mosaic disks of warm red stone or rosily veined marbles were set in as needed. To soften the stony seat loose cushions stuffed with gorgeously embroidered leather or silk were tossed in the chairs. A mandarin household furnished magnificently throughout with teak was what gave the idea of imitation to the English in Hong-Kong and to both English and Americans when they settled in the coast cities of China.

For years Canton has done a flourishing business in the manufacture of this special type of furniture, and with an eye to trade the Cantonese learned to copy the shapes of European furniture, to upholster in tufted silk and satin and thereby forget their classic Chinese forms entirely. This is to be lamented, for now that teak is coming into fashion on this side of the Pacific, the buyers clamor for fine specimens of the pure old Cantonese shapes.

The American purchaser prefers his teak chair or table to be stained black, its seat and top to be of marble, and he does not wince at paying a good big price. A genuine mandarin's bed of red-brown wood, decorated not only with fanciful carving but a record in ivory figures along the panels of the mandarin's noble deeds in peace and war, readily commands $850. A table from a prince's palace library, its top a mosaic of pebbles as bright and varied as a platter of jewels, fetches a little short of $500, while a superb chair of classic old Chinese shape, its seat and circular center of back of warm red marble, is worth no less than $350.

These rather abnormal prices are asked because now that the French own Tonquin they levy a heavy export duty on the ironwood taken from their forests, and a second liberal duty is paid at the American ports before the eastern furniture can be brought in. The situation, however, is no damper on the enthusiasm of the teak-furniture collectors in the United States, who are decided upon having the best and who buy the richest embroideries they can lay their hands upon to use in making cushions for their costly chairs and tables and for draping the wicker mattressed beds where generations of pig-tailed princes have slept the sleep of the just Chinaman.—Chicago Record.

Proper Way to Fit Shoes.

People would find less difficulty with ready-made shoes, says an experienced salesman, if they would stand up to fit them on, instead of sitting down. Nine persons out of ten, particularly ladies, want a comfortable chair while they are fitting a shoe, and it is with the greatest difficulty you can get them to stand for a few minutes even after the shoe is fitted. Then, when they begin walking about, they wonder why the shoes are not so comfortable as they were at the first trial. A woman's foot is considerably smaller when she sits in a chair than when she walks about. Exercise brings a large quantity of blood into the feet.

New Use for the Wheel.

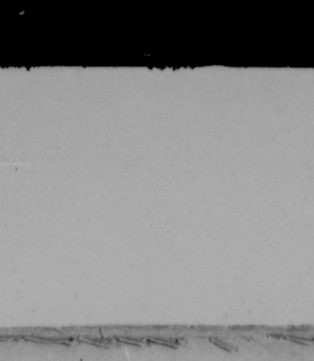
In Devonshire the cycle has been applied to butter making. A man sits on his bicycle, pedals, and, by means of a chain, turns the churn.

PRINCESS CLEMENTINE.

Daughter of Belgian King to Be a Nun in Spite of the Protests of Her Father.

Princess Clementine of Belgium, who will soon enter a convent and take the veil against the protests of her father, has desired to retire into a religious life for the past two years and has been thus far restrained by parental authority.

The princess is the third and youngest daughter of King Leopold of Belgium. She was born on July 30, 1872. One of her sisters is married to Prince Phillip of Saxe-Coburg, and the other, who is eight years older than



PRINCESS CLEMENTINE.
(Daughter of Belgian King to Enter a Nunnery.)

Clementine, is the widowed crown princess of Austria. The mother of these women, Queen Marie Henriette, is the daughter of the late Archduke Joseph of Austria.

Belgium's fair candidate for the veil is one of the most charming of royal girls. She is noted for her humane disposition and for her fondness for animals. Her favorite pet is a small and very white woolly dog, which is the constant companion of her drives and promenades. Visitors to the royal household of Belgium have been compelled, willy nilly, to break bread with this dog, whose devoted mistress must have its company at table. The dog's seat is betwen those of the queen and the princess.

Clementine not long ago was betrothed, or was said to have been betrothed, to Prince Albert of Flanders, who paid a visit to America not long since. She was also said to have been engaged to Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria, but all of these stories now turn out to have been mere gossip. It is said that the young woman has irrevocably made up her mind to become a nun.

THE IDEAL HUSBAND.

He Not Only Provides Well for His Family, But Shows Constant Consideration for His Wife.

The man who makes the best husband has a temper calculated to bear the wear and tear of everyday life. He does not fly into a passion at a trifle, or vent his rage at things that nobody on earth could have prevented. He may show his righteous wrath on occasions, and rail at persons or things that deserve it, but he doesn't harp on the annoyance for hours afterward and make everybody about him miserable. A good proportion of men who take to drink do it because they have little else to occupy their time. When a man takes to doing nothing from choice, look out for that man. He is pretty sure to soon drift into bad habits. The best of husbands is considerate; he is always thoughtful regarding his wife, performing various acts likely to minister to her comfort. If men had any idea how women love to be taken care of and looked after they would, perhaps, exercise their own powers in that direction a little oftener. Consideration smooths a wife's ways for her. When a husband comes home at night and he meets her, tired and worn with the burden and cares of the day, of which he knows nothing, a kind word will cheer and comfort her as nothing else will. — N. SLEEP AND BEAUTY.

Rosy Cheeks and the Hue of Health Depend Largely on the Rest a Woman Takes.

Beauty has its foundation in physical well-being, which must be understood and obeyed, these laws being clearly indicated in our physical and mental constitutions. They demand: Proper food and drink in such quantities as the system is capable of readily assimilating; air and sunlight in abundance; sufficient exercise, rest and sleep; an agreeable temperature; perfect cleanliness. The whole secret of perfect form and rosy cheeks lies in pure blood, produced by wholesome food, by healthy and active vital organs, oxygenated and vitalized in well-expanded lungs, and kissed by the life-giving sunlight on the surface of the warm cheek. She who will have the color she covets on any other terms must buy it of the apothecary and renew it every time she makes her toilette. We cannot insist in this connection too strongly upon the importance of that essential—sleep. It is perfectly hopeless to expect rosy cheeks and the hue of health if care be not taken to devote a proper number of hours to sleep. The actual number depends much upon the individual.—N. Y. Weekly.

Newspaper Frauds.

"Non-partisan" papers, edited by partisans, are the most patent humbugs of the age. In commenting upon public matters they start out non-partisan, but wind up partisan. They are simply frauds. A partisan paper is the more to be admired. It sacrafices patronage for principle. It is more honest, for it does not play for both sides, and does not pretend to be anything than partisan. There is nothing antagonistic to honesty in being partisan, and there is every inducement to dishonesty in being non-partisan or independent. The most despicable object is a partisan who pretends to conduct a non-partisan or independent paper, and then by his acts endorses every principle and policy which his party espouses.—Westminster (Md.) Advocate.

GOVERNOR SMITH seems to be making a number of promises in reference to what the new election law will be after the ring Democrats have gotten through with it. According to his version of the story it will then be fit for the center jewel of a crown on account of his brilliancy and purity. The Reform League of Baltimore, composed of the brightest, brainest and best citizens of that community, have appointed a committee to sit in constant watch on everything the legislature does. The Baltimore Sun, which claims to be always right and just, branded the legislature as the most disgracefully corrupted body that has ever disgraced the State House, and said that it would have been much better if the legislature had never been. Bearing that in mind, the Reform League and others will scarcely put much confidence in the promises of the ring governor that the ring legislature will frame a law to prevent the ring from perpetuating itself in power by fair means or foul. The liberties of the people are in danger. Every good citizen should arouse himself to the fact, and prevent the fair name of Maryland, by the machinations of the ring, from becoming synonymous with everything that is corrupted, degrading and shameless in politics.

The Power Behind the Throne.

During the course of the last State campaign the prediction was frequently made that the election of John Walter Smith meant the restoration of Arthur Pue Gorman to the domination of State politics and would aid that wily politician's scheme for getting back into the Senate in spite of the popular revolt which sent him into retirement. It is now quite evident even to those who were disposed to credit the shallow pretense that was put forward at the time when it was considered wise for Gorman to keep under cover, namely that Gorman was out of politics, that this was but pretense. His party mastery has had frequent proof in the line of appointments, on which comment has from time to time been made, and the forthcoming attempt to deprive a portion of the voting population of their opportunities to vote is no more nor less than the design of the same individual, who, instead of being out of politics, is exerting his political skill in the direction of securing a Legislature which will name him as United States Senator. There is many a slip between the cup and the lip. The legislation in contemplation is of extremely doubtful constitutionality, despite the fact that John P. Poe says it is all right; the plan to confuse the voter by the rearrangement of the ballots and the absence of party emblems may cut two ways, and those anti-Gorman Democrats who were disposed to take John Walter Smith's platform declarations at their face value, may be expected to take a determined stand to prevent the realization of the hopes that were so carefully kept in obscurity when they listened to the voice of John Walter, and put him down as a man whose highest interest was the good of the State, instead of the ambitions of the discredited political ring for restoration to power.

Mr. Smith was a Gorman lieutenant when he was nominated and elected; he is a Gorman lieutenant now. His yielding to the demands of the extra-sessionists showed from which quarter come his political inspirations, and that he serves Gorman better than he serves the State.

Gorman will nevertheless find several obstacles in his pathway, even if all seems smooth and tractable at Annapolis.

Admirals and Gunners.

In the opinion of Admiral Sampson the chances that a ship's gunner may develop into a gentleman are a matter of such doubt that he is constrained to oppose the selection of ensigns from among the gunners who may be found deserving of promotion. The Admiral evidently thinks that the officers in the naval service should all be selected from among she young persons graduated at Annapolis, who are thereby fitted socially as well as nautically for preferment.

It is a pleasure to observe that Admiral Sampson's opinion in this regard is, so far as heard from, peculiar to himself. His candor in declaring himself is meritorious. He is entitled to his opinion; but it is not the opinion of any considerable number of his countrymen. It is, on the contrary, so absolutely un-American and so little justified by the record of the famous naval captains who in the past have won imperishable honor for themselves and their country that its expression gives an inside and unfavorable view of Admiral Sampson's character. A man may be a gentleman though he be a blacksmith or a weaver or a gunner. A man may be of fit material out of which to make Captains and Commodores and Admirals without ever having heard of Annapolis.

The distinguished service rendered his country by Admiral Sampson dulls the edge of criticism leveled against him; but it may be esteemed a fortunate accident that has disclosed him for what he really is.

The Extra Session from Moral and Party Considerations.

Baltimore Methodist.

Perhaps no more potent reasons have been given against the calling of an extra session of the Legislature, on both moral and party grounds, than have been furnished by the Sun of this city. We refer to the matter particularly from the moral standpoint as presented by the Sun.

The position of the Sun, as among the most reputable journals of our State, and withal its unquestioned allegiance to the Democratic party, make its utterances all the more significant, and calculated to have great weight with Governor Smith, indicating, as its utterance quoted does, the baneful effect of such session upon the general welfare of the citizens of the State, and upon the party to which it is so devotely attached. In its issue of April 2, 1900, just after the adjournment of the regular session, it said editorially:

The Legislature of Maryland adjourns at midnight to-night. If it had never met, the people of Maryland and the Democratic party would have been better off. The Democratic Legislature of 1900 "takes the cake" as a body utterly out of touch with the people and conspicuously indifferent to popular interests. Besides "taking the cake" it might just as well have taken everything else in sight, including the State House, which seems to have become of no further use to the people. The result of this legislative session may be a "grand inquest" by the people on the Democratic party at the next State election."

If such be the character of the Legislature, and no one should know this better than the Sun, what may be expected if it undertakes to deal with so intricate and involved a question as that of the suffrage under the Constitution and laws of the State as they now exist? This characterization of the Legislature, moreover, does not come from an opposing partisan journal, but from one which contributed much to the election of that very body. The words of the Sun doubtless were spoken more in sorrow than in anger. They are the verdict of a journal on evidence, and against its wishes, and here lies its tremendous force—"The tree is known by its fruits." What may be expected of the body if again assembled, the Sun has clearly shown. As a religious journal, vitally concerned for the morals of our State, if not for the success of any political party, we fear the session of a body, to quote the Sun, "utterly out of touch with the people, and conspicuously indifferent to popular interests." As to whether, to again quote the Sun, "the result of this legislative session may be a grand inquest on the Democratic party at the next election," we cannot say, but must leave to the politicians and the people—yet such a fear should have weight with the Executive of the State, alike on general and party grounds.

Communicated.

To the Editor of The Republican.

I am sure you and your many readers are not surprised that Governor Smith, of our dear old State of Maryland, has, after the great persuasion that has been brought to bear on him, issued a call for an extraordinary session of the State Legislature. He gives several reasons in support of his action, but they are not such as disguise his real object or the work his advisers have in view. That object is to secure a change in the election laws eliminating the colored vote. The hope is through such means to make Democratic success in future a certainty in the State under a leadership which has under existing conditions been twice repudiated at the polls. If, when the Legislature meets, therefore, a bill is presented drawn in conformity with the Governor's wishes its title should read: "A bill to facilitate the return of A. P. Gorman to the United States Senate and Free Rasin to control the city of Baltimore." Such at any rate will be the title the measure will bear in the minds of the public within and without the Commonwealth of Maryland.

It is hardly necessary to point out that the colored vote in Maryland has never been a menace to good government, local or national. Negro domination has never been possible, never been attempted. The Republican leadership has always been native and of unquestioned character and ability. So far above criticism are they that in one State and two National campaigns they took for their coadjutors the pick of the Maryland Democracy and the independent press of Baltimore and the combination won on all three occasions by handsome majorities. The colored vote in Maryland has always been well and worthily led and its claim to consideration is based upon the fact that through its assistance the Rasin-Gorman gang was driven from power and our State has twice recorded herself for sound money and protection to American industries. Does a vote like that deserve to be outlawed and especially in the interests of ringsters of the grade of Mr. Gorman?

Under the Constitution the session can continue no longer than 30 days, but that will be ample time for the bosses to carry out their nefarious plans.

But, Mr. Editor, that reminds me of the fact that we have a Senator and two Delegates to elect from our county next fall who will assist in electing the next United States Senator and the name of the Hon. A. F. George presents itself to my mind as the logical candidate for Senator. Mr. George is not only one of the leading Republicans of the county, but a very hard worker for the party. He has also had experience at Annapolis, as he ably represented us there a few years ago. VOTER.

SHORTY.

La Grippe Quickly Cured.

"In the winter of 1898 and 1899 I was taken down with a severe attack of what is called La Grippe," says F. L. Hewett, a prominent druggist of Winfield, Ill. "The only medicine I used was two bottles of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. It broke up the cold and stopped the coughing like magic, and I have never since been troubled with Gripppe." Chamberlain's Cough Remedy can always be depended upon to break up a severe cold and ward off any threatened attack of pneumonia. It is pleasant to take, too, which makes it the most desirable and one of the most popular preparations in use for these ailments. For sale by all druggists.

SMALLPOX EPIDEMIC.

Dr. Fulton Says That Disease Threatens to Become Epidemic.

"Smallpox is practically epidemic in the United States, now," said Dr. John B. Fulton, Secretary of the State Board of Health.

"It is not very serious yet, but I have noticed in the last year or two there is both an increase in the number of cases and the virulence of the disease.

"The trouble is that very few doctors know anything about smallpox in a practical way, for they have had no opportunities for years to study it. When they make an incorrect diagnosis they are apt to stick to it.

"Wholesale vaccination is a remedy. Get vaccinated every time you hear of smallpox patients around, no matter whether you were vaccinated one year ago or ten years ago. It may not take, but it can do no harm.

"We have had in Maryland this fall and winter 24 cases in Montgomery county, two in Anne Arundel, and possibly two in Howard. All these and other cases have been traced directly to one man who arrived at Lakeland, Prince George's county, from Washington on July 19.

"There have been several cases in Allegany county, but the disease there seems to be stamped out."

Obituary.

Mrs. Sophia Savage, wife of Wesley Savage, of near Sang Run, this county, was born Nov. 20, 1833, and died at her home, of pneumonia, on Feb. 4, 1901, aged 67 years, 2 months and 15 days. She was a daughter of John S. Friend and was converted when about 17 years of age and joined the Methodist Episcopal church, of which she was a faithful and consistent member for fifty years.

For the past twenty years she had been an invalid, and although often a great sufferer, yet she was always cheerful and contented. She was a dilligent reader of the Bible and at the time of her death was reading it through for the twelfth time.

She leaves a husband and nine children to mourn her death. The names of the children are Mary E., wife of Winfield Savage (deceased); Annie L., wife of R. M. Enlow; Lou A., wife of Geo. W. Moon; Emma J., wife of W. A. Smith; Maud, wife of H. B. Ferguson, and Bruce, Dellie, Murettie and Hallie at home.

The remains were interred in the graveyard on the farm of Judge D. H. Friend, where she awaits the archangel's call at the resurrection of the just. She will be greatly missed, not only by members of the family, but by a large circle of friends. But we'll see her again in that day.

D. A. FRIEND.

Judge Daniel Wilson had a herd of thirteen yearling calves which he valued very highly. They got into an outhouse in which some paint left over from painting his residence last summer was stored and drank a quantity of it, resulting in the death of eight of them.

Second:-Because they have so skillfully combined the various ingredients that the best possible results are obtained by its use.

Third:-Because it has made so many sickly, delicate children strong and healthy, given health and rosy cheeks to so many pale, anaemic girls, and healed the lungs and restored to full health, so many thousands in the first stages of Consumption.

The lime kiln at Thayerville, which was built during the past summer by Messrs. John O. and William Thayer, has been kept running to its full capacity during the entire winter. One day recently 37 farmers of the Thayerville community hauled lime from the kiln to their farms. The quality of lime burned is of the best. The little enterprise furnishes employment to eight or ten men continuously.

Mr. L. P. White, of New Whatcom, Washington, an old time friend of the editor's, made us a visit Tuesday quite unexpectedly. Mr. White was formerly a resident of Terra Alta, where he was engaged in the newspaper business but later as the cashier of the bank there. He went to New Whatcom three years or more ago and opened a bank where he has been quite successful. He was accompanied to Oakland by his brother William T. White, Esq., of Terra Alta.

Rev. Oliver C. Miller, whose sermon on the Philippines delivered in one of the Washington (D. C.) churches last Sunday and published in another column of this paper to-day, was at one time the pastor of the Oakland Lutheran congregation. Recently Mr. Miller was assigned by the War Department at Washington to duty as chaplain at the Presidio in San Francisco, Cal., for which point he will leave within a short time. His family is already in San Francisco.

Mr. John T. Mitchell was called to Listonburg, Pa., Tuesday evening by a telegram announcing the very serious illness of his father, who has been sick for several weeks. Mr. Edwin L. Mitchell has been with his father for a week or more.

There never has been a winter so hard on the old people as this one has been. A large number of the aged have been taken away by the severity of the weather due to its sudden and unforseen changes. The grip and other ailments of this nature has never been larger or more persistent.

We publish elsewhere in this issue of THE REPUBLICAN the statement showing the condition of the Garrett County Band at the close of business on Feb. 5th, 1901. Under the able and conservative management of its officers and especially its cashier, Mr. Scott T. Jones, the bank is doing a splendid business and is keeping fully abreast of the times.

During the recent cold spell a great deal of ice was housed. Many had not cut any ice during the previous part of the winter but filled their houses last week. The freezing weather kept up for so many days in succession that the ice was frozen over a foot in thickness. Some are cutting ice yet as the thaw has affected the ponds but little.

More Prizes for Messrs. H. Weber & Sons.

William Weber, Esq., returned from Baltimore Saturday afternoon, where he had been attending a meeting of the American Carnation Society during the week. He was accompanied here by a party of florists from Cincinnati, who remained as his guests until late the same evening, when they went on home.

At the flower show Messrs. Weber & Sons met with their usual success in being awarded prizes. The first prize for 100 blooms of white carnations was carried off by them, the prize winner being the "Norway," their own seedling, which has at once taken first place all over the country. They also won a $25 silver cup offered by Peter Ellis, the originator of the Lawson carnation, for which $30,000 was paid for a single bloom, for a collection of 50 blooms of that flower. A bronze medal for best 12 blooms of undesseminated seedling, "Norway," and prizes in Class C were awarded Webers' also.

The "Norway," which is a white bloom, secured 91 points in the award of merit in the seedling class.

Special Meeting of Oakland Club.

The executive committee of the Oakland Club has called a meeting for to-night at the Club rooms when a proposition will be submitted to the member of the advisability of establishing a furniture factory in Oakland to be operated by a joint stock company to be composed of business men and the citizens of Oakland generally.

The owners of the Oakland Planing Mill will be present and submit their plans for the transfer of the mill property to the proposed stock company. The mill is fitted with nearly all the machinery necessary for the manufacture of furniture of every description. It is desirably located along the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad and is of easy access. Surrounding the mill buildings are storage warehouses and sufficient land for the enlargement of the plant should the business require it.

Seriously Injured.

Alex. R. Wilson, aged 24 years, son of Judge and Mrs. Daniel Wilson, residing over in District No. 13, was engaged on Monday in trailing logs down an incline when he was caught between the trail and the fender and seriously injured by being squeezed about his hips and legs. He succeeded in extricating himself from his perilous position by stopping his horses just in the nick of time, otherwise he might have lost his life. He was found shortly after the accident by Scott Harvey, a neighbor, who was passing along the road and who heard his call. Mr. Wilson was conveyed to his home where he was examined by a physician but no bones were found to be broken. He will be incapacitated from work for some time.

Death of William A. Daily.

William A. Daily, a member of the bar of Oakland died in the county infirmary of paralysis of the heart on Saturday afternoon last after an illness of a few days. The deceased was taken to the infirmary Friday evening at his own request where he was given the best of attention.

Mr. Daily was born in Hampshire county, W. Va., in 1842, and was reared to maturity in that locality. When the Civil war broke out he enlisted as a private in Company A, Thirty-third Virginia Volunteers, Stonewall Brigade, commanded by that noted general, Stonewall Jackson. He participated in many of the most memorable and fateful campaigns of the war and was wounded seven times. After having served throughout the war as a faithful and heroic defender of what he believed to be right, he removed from his native State to Maryland. In 1871 he came to Oakland and engaged in the mercantile business. In 1874 he entered the law office of Col. John W. Veitch and after thoroughly mastering the intricacies of the law he was admitted to the bar in 1878. Mr. Daily was a member of the Presbyterian church and politically a Democrat.

In 1878 he was married to Miss Jean K. Jamesson, of Fairfax county, Va. She was a most devout Christian woman and a faithful and loving wife and mother. In 1892, when she was in her 53rd year, the family circle was broken by her death and she was tenderly laid away in the Oakland cemetery, leaving besides her husband three sons, John, Jacob and Paul, none of whom are residing in Oakland at present, John being engaged in business at Atlanta, Ga., and Paul at Piedmont.

The brother of the deceased, Dr. John Dailey, of Piedmont, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Dailey and one or two other near relatives were present at the funeral which took place Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock from the Presbyterian church in Oakland, and which was largely attended. Rev. S. M. Engle, former pastor of the church here, conducted the services, assisted by Rev. Brown, of Terra Alta, the present pastor of the church. Rev. Engle's sermon was of more than ordinary power and if its teachings were taken to heart and conscientiously carried out there would be far less sin and sorrow in the world.

Mr. Dailey's remains were interred alongside those of his wife in Oakland. May he rest in peace.

Will Be Severe.

Judge Stake in passing sentence on a prisoner at Hagerstown for carrying concealed weapons, said: "I see the dockets are filled with cases against parties for carrying concealed weapons. The practice must be broken up."

Death of August Schmidt.

Last week this paper contained a short account of the death of August Schmidt, a highly respected German citizen of this county, who died very suddenly on Wednesday of last week.

Mr. Schmidt was born in Manchester, Hanover, Germany, on Feb. 25th, 1831, and in 1865 he came to this country, settling at Oakland where he was married to Rachael Beckman, who was also born in Germany. After a short residence in Oakland, where Mr. Schmidt was engaged in the blacksmithing business, he removed to near Thayerville, where he spent the remainder of his life in farming. Being of a generally healthy constitution it was quite a surprise to his loved ones when he was suddenly called to his long home, dying in the presence of his aged wife and younger son, the only members of the family at home. He was aged 69 years, 11 months and 26 days. He leaves besides his wife five sons and three daughters, they being Henry A., Lewis A., William F., Carl P. and George F., Mrs. Henry W. Kahl, of Oakland; Misses Elizabeth S. and Bettie A. His funeral took place on Friday, the services being conducted by Rev. Bleabanecht, the German Lutheran minister of Accident, in the Thayerville Baptist church. The pallbearers were Mr. Henry W. Kahl and the five sons of the deceased. The interment was made in the Thayerville cemetery in the presence of a large concourse of sympathizing friends and neighbors.

Died.

CRIM.—On Feb. 18th, at the residence of her son at Downsville, Washington county, Md., Mrs. Nancy Crim, aged 80 years, 7 months and 6 days. The deceased lady was the mother of Mrs. Wm. L. Leary, of Oakland, with whom she made her home for several months prior to going to her son's R. S. Crim, where she died.

LAKLE.—"Mother" Lakle, of Keyser Ridge, died and was buried on Tuesday of last week week in the Cove. Mrs. Lakle was eighty-five years of age. She was a cripple for the last fifteen years of her life, having been injured in a runaway.

Admits His Guilt.

The fake M. E. South preacher, J. H. Graham, who stole a horse belonging to Sampson Taylor, a farmer near Keyser, Friday night, who was captured near Kline's Gap, in Grant county, and landed in jail at Keyser, claims to be a minister in the M. E. church South and says he has baptized 1300 converts and has built four churches during his ministry. He admits having stolen the horse and says he knows where many other stolen horses have been sold in lumber woods and will assist the sheriff in laying his hands on them if the sheriff will divide the profits.

Essential to Success.

No judicious and persistent advertiser in the newspapers who has offered for sale articles of any merit has failed to score a business success. Hundreds of large advertisers have given testimony that their success would have been impossible without newspaper advertising. In floating 60,000 shares of copper company stock Mr. T. W. Lawson expended $30,000 for newsparer space, and received subscriptions for 160,000 shares at $25 each. Mr. Post has been offered a million and a half for his cereal business, which he says he built up "by newspaper advertising exclusively."

Teachers' Institute.

A local teachers' institute was held at Grantsville Friday evening, Feb. 22.

The institute begun with an entertaining and profitable program rendered by the Grantsville school and the young people of the town.

The program, which is principally based on the subjects, Washington, Lincoln and the American Flag, is very appropriate for the time and occasion—while the "hatchet" agitator is great, while this is the birthday of the "hatchet" boy who grew up to be a man that has shaped the destinies of generations past and still continues to live in the hearts of those he has left, although over a century, while the Emblem of Liberty is waving its broad stripes and its 45 bright stars over the home of free and islands of the sea—apparently the American Eagle is screaming louder than ever.

The good sleighing and beautiful weather brought a large attendance. An attractive feature was the performance of the fair maids.

Saturday morning the devotional services were conducted by Rev. E. C. Bedford, pastor of the M. E. church.

The officers were: C. G. Teats, chairman; L. J. Beachy, secretary.

Noon found us with an enrollment of 22 teachers from various districts. Among the many different subjects ably treated by the teachers was the "Compulsory School Law," which was left to the teachers for a vote, who decided in favor of such a law.

The institute adjourned at 3.30 p. m.

THE ETERNAL CALENDAR.

In that far center of the wheeling spheres,
  Where suns and systems take their time and light,
Hangs high the calendar of eternal years;
  Which keep the days but knows no passing night.

Days not of hours, but of the centuries made;
  A thousand years complete their daily run;
By these the comet's wandering course is laid,
  Through systems vast from sun to sun;

And ponderous orbs whose measured track
  Circle through space beyond our sight or ken
Whirl on and on and ever safe come back;
  And then on time another course begin.

God of the Universe! Forever One;
  For whom the past and future are the same,
Guard of the changing centuries past and gone,
  Whose stately march Thy power might proclaim.

Thou art our Sponsor for the coming days,
  In small or largest measures be they cast;
The dawning century shall extend the praise
  Our hearts first learned from Thee in that now past.

And when earth's journey, and our fleeting years,
  Are closed for aye, and time itself is o'er,
Bring our frail bark, past storm, and surf, and fears,
  To harbor, safe, by that Eternal shore.
—Rev. F. L. Piper, in N. Y. Observer.

Saved by Road Runners

By Clarence Pullen.

IT WAS in New Mexico, on the river trail between Socorro and Mesilla, with Jim Haskell driving the buckboard team, that I first saw a road runner. The bird had started from the roadside into the trail and was running with surprising speed in advance of our team—a saucy-looking fellow, somewhat larger than a snipe, with a straight bill, long tail feathers, short wings, of which he made no apparent use, and long, muscular legs.

"There's a bird that ought to be encouraged by all right-minded men, for he kills rattlesnakes," Haskell remarked after telling me what it was. "If it were not for this trait and the fact that a pair of these birds came to my help once when I was in a bad way my bones would be whitening in Sand canyon to-day.

"It began with my being driven into the brush one night by Indians in the Magdalena mountains, where I was prospecting for silver, in '81," Haskell continued.

"I got away from them with only the clothes I stood in, and I was pretty well beat out before I came at noon next day to where I could see the Rio Grande valley ahead. I was then in one of those steep-walled little canyons that you find in sandstone formations—a hot, narrow passage, with fine sand under foot that I shuffled and slipped in as I walked.

"I could see the canyon's mouth when I came to a place where the bottom dropped down sheer for about ten feet, and in trying to make the jump I slipped, landing any way that happened on the sand below, and when I had got some breath back into my body and I tried to rise to my feet I found that my right ankle had been thrown out of joint.

"This was piling worse luck on bad, but I did not lose heart, for through the rift ahead I could see, across the sands, green fields and trees, adobe houses and the blue sparkle of the river. I needed all my courage just then, being faint through pain and hunger, and parched with thirst.

"Scarcely had I started, on hands and knees, to crawl out of the canyon when I saw something that caused me to pause and look about me as if I were hunting for a lost diamond. Along the bottom of the canyon, in the loose sand, was a mark such as might be made by a dragging rope, and it led from the place where I had fallen toward the opening ahead. It was the trail of a snake, a big one, and in New Mexico a snake that could make a track like this was almost sure to be a rattler.

"Two immense rock columns, their faces cut and hollowed into queer shapes by the freaks of blowing sand, made a natural gateway to the canyon, and against their bases the sand was drifted, leaving a narrow opening along the center. I had worked along this opening until I was midway between the columns, when a snake somewhere near me sprung his rattle sharply.

"For full ten minutes I listened, with the whole air about me alive with the buzzing, before I could locate the sound as coming from directly ahead of me. Then I crept on slowly, holding myself ready to crawfish backward on short notice.

"With all my carefulness I was so close to the snake when I discovered him that I was startled all over. He was a yellow rattlesnake, the biggest and most vicious poison snake of the southwest, and his color was so nearly that of the sand he lay on that if his rattles had not warned me I might not have seen him then. He had dined not long before, as the lump in his body showed, and now, comfortably coiled in the sand, he was in no mind to be disturbed.

"I was too far away from the snake for him to strike me, and I stayed, wondering how I was to get past him. A queer feeling came over me, everything else faded from my view, and I saw only his shining eyes, which seemed to spread as they filled all the space around.

"It was the pain of a sharp wrench of my injured ankle that broke the charm that was overcoming me, and made me aware that I had started forward directly toward the snake. I shut my eyes, turned and went back from the sight of the reptile as fast as I could.

"But I was far from being out of my troubles from the snake. The track in the sand showed that he had come from under the 'jump-off' in the canyon bottom where I had fallen, and if he took it into his head to return it was certain that he would make objection to my presence. Being gorged and sleepy, he was not likely to move soon unless he was disturbed, but it might be another thing when the night came on and the air and ground got cool outside.

"There was no way out for me except along the narrow rift between the sand heaps at the canyon entrance, and it was at the widening of this rift, beyond the standstone columns, that the snake was lying. To try to creep round him, against the face of the sand heap, was too risky to be undertaken with my crippled leg, and it was plain that so long as the snake stood guard at the passage there was nothing for me to do but stay where I was.

"The chance that any human being would come to Sand canyon was too remote to be considered, and there was nothing at hand that I could use as a weapon against the snake—not a rock, not a stick, was to be found, only the sandstone walls above and the fine sand beneath me.

"Worn out with fatigue I fell asleep, and when I woke the sun was shining straight into the canyon, by which I knew that it was in the west, an hour or so high above the mountains.

"From where I lay I could look through the canyon entrance, and my eyes rested upon the valley beyond, and my ugly jailer, faithful to his post, coiled asleep in the sun. But something else that I saw, it struck me as strange that I had not observed before; five or six long pieces of dry cactus on the sand near the snake that seemed to have been carelessly flung down in such a way as almost to surround him.

"I was too miserable and listless to wonder much at anything, but my mind struggled feebly over the problem of how the cactus came to be there, until, with a patter of quick feet and the rustle of something dragged softly over the sand, a bird came into my view, beyond the canyon gateway—a road-runner, dragging along a cactus limb as long as my arm.

"He cast a sharp glance into the canyon as he approached, but seeing nothing to alarm him in the motionless figure lying half buried in sand, went on and laid the cactus down near the sleeping snake. A minute more and a second bird appeared carrying a cactus limb, and the two then set to work pulling all the pieces of cactus about until they had made a complete ring around the snake. This done, they both set off again to fetch more cactus and they came and went until they had made a ring of cactus limbs three deep around the rattler without arousing him from his sleep.

"The birds at last seemed to think that they had cactus enough for their purpose, and instead of fetching more they began to roll the outside pieces forming the ring over upon the inside. The circle narrowed fast, and the cactus fence grew higher as it drew closer about the snake.

"The barricade was half a foot high around him, when the snake suddenly lifted his head and sounded his rattle. At this the birds backed away and began to run around the barricade, flapping their wings, screaming and making feints of attacking the snake, but taking good care to keep well out of his reach.

"He would have gone through fire rather than try to crawl over dry cactus, but several times he struck at the birds, his neck and head bringing up every time against the thorny barricade. Angered by his failure to reach them and pricked and torn by thorns, the snake with every stroke became more enraged, until, eager to strike at something which he could reach, he turned back his head after a particularly vicious lunge, and struck his fangs into his own body.

"His head dropped upon his coil, and in a few minutes he lay motionless, while the birds hopped around the barricade screaming and trying to provoke him to strike. For awhile the snake would lift his head and sound his rattle when they came very near, but he did not offer to strike at them again. Head and rattle ceased at last to move, and then, as if satisfied that their work had been thoroughly done, the birds started off together and I saw them no more.

"The sun had gone behind the mountains and night was falling. I crawled down past the dead snake in his prison, and shaping my course for the nearest light in the valley I kept on, resting and creeping by turns, until after about three hours I came to a traveled trail.

"Tomas Garcia, coming late from the mountains with his ox team, bringing a load of wood, found me, and took me to his house by the river. Here he and his family made me as comfortable as they could for the night, and the next day he carried me to Socorro, where I got proper surgical care for my ankle and the means of a new outfit when I was ready to take the trail.—Boston Globe.

No Uncertainty Here.

There is never any uncertainty as to the sex of the thief who robs a post office, says the Chicago Tribune. He is a mail robber.

LOOK AHEAD.

I wouldn't go back, if I were you,
  To the town of Used-to-Be,
For you'd be too late to enter the gate,
  And no one could find the key.

I'd go straight forward, if I were you,
  To the city of Wideawake,
Where the great crowd pours through the open doors,
  Its place in the world to make.

Try to forget Disappointment Vale,
  And the glade of Ne'er-do-well,
And make up your mind not to look behind
  Where the doubts and shadows dwell.

Lift up your eyes to the future, lad,
  With a manly gaze and true,
And hasten along with a hopeful song,
  For the big world cares for you.

FIRE STATION MASCOT.

Kitty, a Chicago Cat, Accompanies Engine Company No. 12 Wherever It May Go.

On one dark night not long ago a vagrant black cat, of such diminutive proportions as to indicate that its eyes had but recently opened for the first time on this world, found its way into No. 12 engine house, in Chicago, and into the hearts of the stalwart fire fighters, who bade it welcome. They fondled the waif in their strong arms and became jealously disputatious when any of them tried to monopolize the attention of the outcast.

Kitty was allowed the freedom of the house, and lost no time in making herself at home. With a cat's natural love of warmth she quickly found her way to the sleeping engine and stowed herself away alongside of the fire pan which keeps up steam when the engine is not in action. It was a nice, warm bed, and so comfortable as compared to the outside cold from which she had so providentially escaped that pussy has never since "cared to wander from her own fireside." When she did wander the other night she took the fireside along with her.

Along in the small hours, when the brave fellows up above, who had sworn to be her protector, were soundly sleeping, there came the wild clang of the alarm bell. In an instant all was commotion in the station. The doors of the stable flew open with a thud, the horses sprang from their stalls and raced to their places beneath the pendent harness. At the same time shadowy, half-dressed forms shot down the shiny brass rods from the apertures above and mounted swiftly to their places on the engine, hose cart and chemical. Then the doors of the station swung open with a bang and the firemen drove madly from the house. A dwelling house in the far northwest was aflame, and it was a long race to save property, perchance lives.

They made a record-breaking run and stopped the fire before the residence had been greatly damaged. During the hour or more that it took to extinguish the flames the engine, hitched to a hydrant, throbbed fiercely and emitted a shower of sparks, which made things uncomfortable for spectators in close proximity. So great was the heat from the furnace, now red with a bed of coals, that perspiration poured from the stoker's face as he steadily fed the fire.

In the flurry of fire fighting pussy had been forgotten, and it was not until the crew returned to the station that the driver of the engine bethought him of his charge. When he bent low and examined pussy's corner, with his heart in his mouth, expecting to find her missing or dead from the heat, kittie proved herself unharmed by purring gently when his hand encountered her.

She had come through the wild night's ride to the fire unscathed and had shown herself to be possessed of all the prerequisite qualities of fearlessness and endurance which become a fireman.

The boys of No. 12 have officially declared her the station's mascot, and they are very proud of their "find." She accompanies them to every fire. —Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

Didn't Want to Be a Girl.

"Papa," said small Tommy, "our Sunday school teacher read that we must all be born again." "Well?" queried the father. "But I don't want to be born again," said the little fellow. "Why not?" asked his father. "Because," answered Tommy, "I'm afraid I might be born a girl."

DEEP-SEA ANGLER FISH.

A Clumsy-Looking Monster with an Enormous Mouth and a Healthy Appetite.

Who that has studied and heard of only ordinary fishes would ever expect to see such a fish go fishing. Yet here is a fish that can fish for its game, yes, and with rod and line, too, as deftly as ever an angler coaxed a trout from a mountain stream.

He is a clumsy looking monster according to our notions of fish beauty. He is sometimes five or six feet in length, with an enormous head in proportion to his body, and a mouth that will enable him to swallow animals nearly as large as himself. He is a poor swimmer and clumsy, and that great mouth must be filled, so he turns fisherman for a living.

Mark these two long feelers which spring from the creature's nose, and how they taper away like veritable fishing rods. To the end of them is attached by a line or a slender filament a small glittering morsel of membrane. This is the bait. The hooks are set in the mouth of the fisherman down below. But how is he to induce the fish to venture within reach of those hooks. They are shy; he must not let them see him, yet he must draw them to him, and he does it by stirring up the mud on the bottom. Then he plies his rod and the glittering bait waves to and fro like a living insect glancing through the turbid water. Then up rises that cavernous mouth from the cloud below and snap! the prey is entombed in the bag-nets, huge sacks attached to its gill covers, in which it stows its victims until enough of them are collected to form a satisfactory mouthful.—Little Chronicle.

A WONDERFUL PLANT.

It Leaves Young Plants Which in the Course of Time Destroy Their Parents.

The "Life plant," as it is called, is found in tropical climates and sometimes in our large greenhouses. When full grown it has rather large and irregular spreading branches. It has thick, waxy, olive-shaped leaves, with notched edges. The flowers are borne on tall, straight stalks, are bell-shaped, and, in the early part of the season, are of a pale green color; as the season advances, however, they become streaked with red and purple.

To a casual observer there is nothing particularly striking about the plant; but if one of the leaves is examined with care, in each notch a tiny brown dot is seen. Each of these brown dots is a collection of minute life cells, the germs of other perfect plants. It is from these life-cells that the plant derives its everyday name—the life plant.

These germs do not develop until the leaf either drops from the parent plant or is plucked and given ample time to mature. Let us imagine that we have a mature leaf before us, and that it is our privilege to watch the germs develop. After four or five weeks have passed tiny leaves on thread-like stems are seen growing from every notch on the leaf, and often a leaf has as many as 14 or 15 notches in its margin. Encouraged by the warm air and the sunshine, the tender little shoots grow with alarming rapidity, and in a short time are so closely clustered together as to almost hide the original leaf.

As the young plants increase in size and strength they absorb the vitality of the parent leaf, and it gradually loses its fresh green color, shrivels and dies. Nature then seems to say to the young plants: "Now you must seek fresh nourishment," so they begin to feel around with their slender roots, and finally send them down deep into the ground for the nutriment needed.

Lived on an Idol's Dinner.

An old sailor, now a pilot at Port Royal, S. C., is fond of relating an incident which occurred near Calcutta, India. The vessel which he commanded was wrecked in the bay of Bengal, and he and two companions were the only ones saved. The three men reached shore, and in seeking food and shelter came upon an immense Hindoo wooden idol. While they were looking at it they saw a party of natives approaching and hid themselves in the bushes near by. Each native carried a dish of eatables which he placed in front of the idol, and after they had departed the hungry sailors had a sumptuous feast. For nearly a week the sailors camped in the vicinity of the idol, living on his provisions, until they were discovered. Then they had a fight with the natives, and although victorious thought it prudent to move on, so they made their way to Calcutta, and there secured passage homeward.

THE NERVES OF WOMEN

"I am so nervous and wretched." "I feel as if I should fly." How familiar these expressions are! Little things annoy you and make you irritable. You can't sleep, you are unfit for ordinary duties, and are subject to dizziness.

That bearing-down sensation helps to make you feel miserable.

You have backache and pains low down in the side, pain in top of head, later on at the base of the brain.

Such a condition points unerringly to serious uterine trouble.

If you had written to Mrs. Pinkham when you first experienced impaired vitality, you would have been spared these hours of awful suffering.

Happiness will be gone out of your life forever, my sister, unless you act promptly. Procure Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound at once. It is absolutely sure to help you. Then write to Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass., if there is anything about your case you do not understand.

You need not be afraid to tell her the things you could not explain to the doctor—your letter is seen only by women and is absolutely confidential. Mrs. Pinkham's vast experience with such troubles enables her to tell you just what is best for you, and she will charge you nothing for her advice.

Mrs. Valentine Tells of Happy Results Accomplished by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—It is with pleasure that I add my testimony to your list, hoping it may induce others to avail themselves of the benefit of your valuable remedy. Before taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, I felt very bad, was terribly nervous and tired, had sick headaches, no appetite, gnawing pain in stomach, pain in my back and right side, and so weak I could scarcely stand. I was not able to do anything. Had sharp pains all through my body. Before I had taken half a bottle of your medicine, I found myself improving. I continued its use until I had taken four bottles, and felt so well that I did not need to take any more. I am like a new person, and your medicine shall always have my praise."—MRS. W. P. VALENTINE, 566 Ferry Avenue, Camden, N. J.

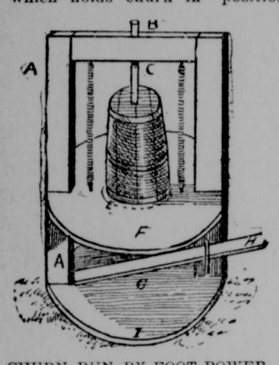
CHURNING MADE EASY.

How to Improve an Old-Time Dash Churn So That It Can Be Run by Foot Power.

The upper illustration shows an old-fashioned dash churn run by foot-power. Frame work for churn is shown at a a, made of one and one-half by two-inch stuff. The dasher handle, b, is fastened to frame a by pin c, which goes through the handle. The churn d is set on platform f inside of a circular ring e, which holds churn in position.



CHURN RUN BY FOOT POWER.

The platform, f, is raised by two coil wire springs, one on each side of churn. A chain at g connects platform f and foot-lever h. The lever h is hinged at post a and works inside of an iron rod attached to the post on the right and to the base of i. The churn works up and down and the dasher stands still. Spring must be just sufficient to lift churn with milk in it.

The lower cut shows a barrel churn to be run by foot-power or by children sitting on c and playing seesaw. The frame is shown, at a, with coil wire spring at b, churn d, axle e on which churn operates, being fastened to churn on each side and revolving in the frame. The platform at f is solid. The spring b lifts the end of the churn d, and c is for the foot or for children to sit on. The buttermilk is drawn off at rear end of churn.—W. A. Sharp, in Farm and Home.

THE SCRUB DAIRYMAN.

He Makes a Poor Quality of Butter and Consequently Is an All-Around Detriment.

Doubtless the storekeeper is in a place to judge the characteristics of a scrub dairyman when the latter brings in his country butter. In order to ascertain the amount and character of the country butter sold in Manhattan (population, 3,600, plus 1,000 students for three-fourths of the year), six grocery firms were interviewed. Country butter amounted to about 76 per cent. of the total sales. This was usually divided into four grades. The average results show 33 per cent. of the amount received in grade No. 1 (the best grade), 23 per cent. in grade No. 2, 17 per cent. in grade No. 3, and 27 per cent. in grade No. 4. On an average 20 per cent. of the amount of country butter received was unfit for local sale and had to be relegated to the renovating factories. One of these firms stated that with a little more reading and studying on the part of the farmers there is no reason why 50 per cent. of the butter that comes under grades No. 3 and No. 4 should not come under grades No. 1 and No. 2. This throwing of eight and ten-cent butter on the market, even though the storekeepers do take it at a loss to themselves in order to hold the butter market trade for groceries, etc., not only indicates a scrub dairyman, but it is a great damage both to the butter consumer and to the dairy interests of the state. Of course every farmer's wife makes the best butter, but somehow or other the quality "best" disappears after it gets out of the hands of its maker. "Whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well," should be the motto of every private buttermaker.—Rural World.

DON'TS FOR THE DAIRY.

Don't ruin a fine dairy calf by mistreatment, but bring it up in the way it should grow, and your cow will be a joy forever.

Don't think that pedigree makes the dairy cow. Some of our best records were made by animals without recorded ancestry of any breed.

Don't be in too big a hurry at any milking to get the last stripping. The only way to keep a cow at her best is to get it all at every milking.

DAIRY OBSERVATIONS.

Ripening the Cream and Working the Butter Are Two Duties That Cannot Be Neglected.

That we may have a first-class article of butter it is not only necessary to have good milk to start with, but every part of the manipulation from beginning to end must be done just about right. The elusive element in butter is flavor, and with strictly pure milk to begin with flavor is chiefly dependent upon proper ripening. Where there is a lack of acid the butter is apt to have a flat taste, and when the acidity has been allowed to run too high, sourness is likely to appear. I find there are comparatively few butter-makers who test for acid. Too many of them depend upon their sense of sight, smell and taste to determine when the proper degree of ripeness has been reached, the same as many butter-makers, years past, tried the temperature of the cream with the finger instead of a thermometer. It is probable that the time is not far distant when it will be as common to test for acid as it now is for temperature, and when they use exact methods they will soon reach a point where they will know exactly how far ripening should be carried.

A good deal is being said and written about working butter. In some instances there has been so much said about overworked butter that makers have gone to the other extreme and do not work enough. Those for whom butter is made desire a condition of the article that is only secured by proper working. Too much of this working is injurious, while too little is defective.

In making good butter there are several conditions dependent on or brought about by working. There should be a certain measure of cohesion among the particles of butter, enough to cause it to adhere together in one mass, or, rather, it should be waxy and compact without being sticky or greasy.

An undue amount of moisture in butter renders it defective and when butter is taken from the churn more water adheres to the particles of granules than is desirable. This excess is taken out by working, and too little of this leaves too much moisture in the butter, while too much working causes the butter to be too dry.

Where the salt is not thoroughly worked through the butter, the product will show streaks and mottles when cut. This is a serious defect, and means a lower price for the goods whenever found. This condition can be overcome by working and mingling the lighter parts with the mass till the salt is evenly distributed, and all becomes one common shade.

The proper working of butter is an important matter and means money to the maker, and it is the maker who gets all these conditions the nearest right who secures the highest score and takes the prizes.—V. M. Couch, in Ohio Farmer.

DURABLE FEED BOX.

One That Will Last for a Long Time and Is Good in the Horse Stable or Dairy Barn.

Feed boxes should be made as substantial and indestructible as possible. The ordinary wooden box is soon eaten up and destroyed, especially by horses. It should be made of clear lumber. Knots are liable to loosen and fall out. It should be constructed with sloping sides as shown in cut, so that the animals can reach the food in all the corners and clean them out. Adhering food decays and sours and pollutes the box to the injury of animals. The edges both on top and bottom should be "armored," as shown, so that there is no chance to bite and gnaw the wood. Such a box will last for years and is good in the horse stable or dairy barn.—F. O. Sibley, in Ohio Farmer.

Cement Floor for a Cellar.

While it is not at all difficult to lay a cement floor it is well to have the advice and assistance of a local mason. The main thing is to get a good foundation of broken stones or bricks at least six inches deep. The cement can then be mixed dry with its bulk of coarse, sharp sand, or fine gravel. Add water and mix very thoroughly until it is a soft uniform mortar. Pour over the foundation, tamping down well until it fills all crevices between the stones. In about 24 hours another thinner coat may be smoothly spread over the surface, making everything level. Cover with hay or straw for several days to avoid too rapid drying and cracking. There is nothing better than cement for the purpose.—Rural New Yorker.

Don't neglect to card and brush the dairy cow daily. It will not take more than three minutes, and will add materially to the income.

CONGRESSMAN HOWARD.

Of National Reputation are the Men Who Recommend Peruna to Fellow Sufferers.

A Remarkable Case Reported From the State of New York.

CONGRESSMAN HOWARD OF ALABAMA.

House of Representatives,
Washington, Feb. 4, 1899.

The Peruna Medicine Co., Columbus, Ohio:

Gentlemen—"I have taken Peruna now for two weeks, and find I am very much relieved. I feel that my cure will be permanent. I have also taken it for la grippe, and I take pleasure in recommending Peruna as an excellent remedy to all fellow sufferers."—M. W. Howard.

Congressman Howard's home address is Fort Payne, Ala.

MOST people think that catarrh is a disease confined to the head and nose. Nothing is farther from the truth. It may be that the nose and throat is the oftenest affected by catarrh, but if this is so it is so only because these parts are more exposed to the vicissitudes of the climate than the other parts of the body.

Every organ, every duct, every cavity of the human body is liable to catarrh. A multitude of ailments depend on catarrh. This is true winter and summer. Catarrh causes many cases of chronic disease, where the victim has not the slightest suspicion that catarrh has anything to do with it.

The following letter which gives the experience of Mr. A. C. Lockhart is a case in point:

Mr. A. C. Lockhart, West Henrietta, N. Y., Box 58, in a letter written to Dr. Hartman says the following of Peruna:

"About fifteen years ago I commenced to be ailing, and consulted a physician. He pronounced my trouble a species of dyspepsia, and advised me, after he had treated me about six months, to get a leave of absence from my business and go into the country. I did so and got temporary relief. I went back to work again, but was taken with very distressing pains in my stomach.

"I seldom had a passage of the bowels naturally. I consulted another physician with no better results. The disease kept growing on me, until I had exhausted the ability of sixteen of Rochester's best physicians. The last physician advised me to give up my work and go south, after he had treated me for one year.

"I was given a thorough examination with the X-ray. They could not even determine what my trouble was. Some of your testimonials in the Rochester papers seemed to me worthy of consideration, and I made up my mind to try a bottle of Peruna. Before the bottle was half gone I noticed a change for the better. I am now on the fifth bottle, and have not an ache or pain anywhere. My bowels move regularly every day, and I have taken on eighteen pounds of flesh. I have recommended Peruna to a great many, and they recommend it very highly. I have told several people that if they would take a bottle of Peruna, and could then candidly say that it had not benefited them, I would pay for the medicine."—A. C. Lockhart.

Mr. W. P. Peterson, of Morris, Ill., says: "I was nearly dead with catarrhal dyspepsia and am now a well man, better, in fact, than I have been for twenty years or more.

"Since I got cured by your Peruna I have been consulted by a great many people."

If you do not derive prompt and satisfactory results from the use of Peruna, write at once to Dr. Hartman, giving a full statement of your case, and he will be pleased to give you his valuable advice gratis.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 25, 1901.

President McKinley doesn't particularly favor the idea of having Congress lay down conditions for the acceptance of the Constitutional Convention of Cuba, in advance of the action of that convention, which is now considering a supplementary declaration setting forth the relations that shall exist between Cuba and the United States, although he is not opposing the attempt that is now being made in that direction with the hope of escaping an extra session of Congress. The President's present plan is to take no action on the Cuban Constitution, which General Wood has been instructed not to officially forward to Washington until the Convention has acted upon the supplementary declaration it is now considering. As soon as that shall have been made it and the Constitution will be forwarded to Washington and President McKinley will issue a call for an extra session of Congress to consider them, provided, of course, that the action of this Congress has made one unnecessary. The House has everything in good shape for the last week of the session, but only legislative experts can untangle the mixture in the Senate. Fortunately, many of the Senators are legislative experts, and when they say that all of the appropriation bills, with the possible exception of the River and Harbor bill, will get through the layman must perforce take their word for it and watch and see.

In the Senate the House bill, appropriating $5,000,000 for the St. Louis exposition, before being passed was amended to provide for closing the exposition on Sunday and to appropriate $250,000 for a government exhibit at the Charleston, S. C., exposition.

Senator Morgan stirred up some bad blood in his efforts to get the Nicaragua Canal bill before the Senate by charging the Republicans with truckling to Great Britain because they decided it would not be courteous to act upon the bill while the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was unacted upon by Great Britain. Senator Spooner reminded him that it was the Senate that made the delay by amending the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and that the Senate could not pass the canal bill while its own amendments were being considered by Great Britain without a breach of international courtesy and decency.

President McKinley has issued a proclamation calling the Senate in extra session March 4 at 12 o'clock noon. This is always done in inauration years, the Senate being called together to act upon executive nominations and has nothing whatever to do with the contemplated extra session of Congress.

It cannot be denied that there are a great many wide-awake office-seekers in this country. Within twenty-four hours of the publication of the death of Mr. Rounseville Wildman, who was U. S. Consul at Hong Kong, and his family through the sinking of the steamship Rio de Janerio outside the Golden Gate, no less than seven applications for his place have been filed at the Department of State.

Everything is in good shape for the inauguration of President McKinley and Vice President Roosevelt, next Monday. Places have been assigned in organizations, military and civic, numbering nearly forty thousand men. Thanks to the public spirit of Secretary Long, the Navy will be more largely represented than in any previous Inaugural parade. The crews of seven vessels of the Navy will march in the parade.

Opinion differs as to whether the Oleomargarine bill will reach a vote in the Senate. It is generally admitted that if voted upon it will be passed.

Under a resolution adopted by the House, Speaker Henderson appointed a committee of five, three Republicans Moody, of Massachusetts, Overstreet, of Indiana, and Long of Kansas, and two Democrats, Bailey, of Texas, and Newlands, of Nevada, to investigate the pay roll of employees of the House and report at once.

The Revenue Reduction bill will not fail. After stubbornly standing for their respective bills long enough to frighten those who did not wish to see the bill fail, the conferees began to talk compromise, and it is now said by them that a compromise bill will be the result. Just what portions of the bill will be most affected by the compromise cannot be stated with any certainty, now, as none of the agreements reached are binding unless agreeement is reached on all sections of the bill, but the probabilities favor a heavy cut in the reductions in the beer and tobacco taxes made by the Senate, and that the total reductions will be some millions below the Senate bill.

Now that an extra session is practically assured, the Democrats who have been re-elected to the House, are indulging in a cat and dog fight among themselves over the Democratic leadership. Representative Richardson of Tennessee, the present leader wishes to continue, but Dearmond, of Missouri, Bankhead, of Alabama, and several others are in the field against him. Republicans are amused at the fight over this very empty honor. Speaker Henderson will be re-elected, by acclamation, as soon as the next House meets.

The House, after reducing the amount from $100 to $50 a month, passed the Senate bill granting a pension to the widow of the late General Henry W. Lawton.

Danger of Colds and La Grippe.

The greatest danger from colds and la grippe is their resulting in pneumonia. If reasonable care is used, however, and Chamberlain's Cough Remedy taken, all danger will be avoided. Among the tens of thousands who have used this remedy for these diseases we have yet to learn of a single case having resulted in pneumonia, which shows conclusively that it is a certain preventive of that dangerous malady. It will cure a cold or an attack of la grippe in less time than any other treatment. It is pleasant and safe to take. For sale by all druggists.
